YOU-OVERLY DEMANDING?

In terms of supply and demand, there's an oversupply of overly demanding people. And more and more people who place a premium on courtesy and consideration are getting the goods on them. Take the test that follows to determine whether or not you're excessively demanding.

1. If you're trying to sell raffles for a charity and a prospective customer turns you down, you should (A) Persist in your sales appeal even though the party doesn't seem to be interested, (B) Express the hope that he'll buy a ticket from you some other time, or (C) Walk away and say nothing?

2. If you're a guest at a party and are smoking a cigar when one of the other guests coughs, you should (A) Continue smoking and say nothing, (B) Ask if the cigar smoke is disturbing the other guest and offer to put it out, or (C) Put out the cigar without asking?

3. If a newspaper telephones for information about an obituary notice and you know the deceased would have liked contributions be made to a particular charity, you should (A) Ask that donations be made in place of flowers, (B) Simply say that contributions to a particular charity would be appreciated, or (C) Leave it entirely to the discretion of other mourners.

4. When you're shopping at a department store and you see a higher price on a "sale" item than which it was advertised in the newspaper, you should (A) Demand to see the manager, (B) Ask the sales person if there isn't a mistake, or (C) Tell the sales person that you will do your shopping elsewhere?

For correct answers, see below.

ANSWERS: 1. (B) Express the wish that he'll buy a raffle from you at some other time. Insisting won't do much good, and walking away and saying nothing could leave a bad aftertaste. 2. (B) Ask if the smoke is disturbing the other guest and offer to put the cigar out. 3. (B) Simply say that contributions to the charity would be appreciated. There is no need to mention flowers and some mourners will wish to send floral tributes as well as make donations. 4. (B) Ask the sales person if there might not be a mistake. Calling the manager or saying that you'll do your shopping elsewhere is excessively demanding. 5. (A) Tell your doctor that you'd like to get another opinion before undergoing surgery.
