LONDON'S GREATEST DAY.

Fulltime Son.
The only foreigner who has ever captured England since William the Conqueror is President Wilson.
William of Orange it is true, did the trick after the Norman time, but he came on invitation of a majority of the English nobles and was not considered as an alien. The President of the United States landed on the English shores mainly on his own invitation and under circumstances that suggested possible misapprehension or suspicion by doubting France on the side of the water.

THE PART OF MARSHALL FOCH IN THE WAR.

Five distinct periods have divided Marshal Foch's career during this war.
Commanding the 26th Corps at the beginning of August, 1914, then commanding the Ninth Army three weeks later on the Marne. Chief Assistant to General Foch to coordinate the operations in the north of France from October 4, 1914, commanding the northern army group in 1915 and 1916, Chief of General Staff in 1917, and finally Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Armies in France on March 26, 1918, he successfully sealed such a large part of the ladder of his High Command.

THE GRAY MAN OF CHRIST.

(Literary Digest.)

The religion of William Hobson-Lern has been one of the active topics of the whole war. It has only been in his very latest utterances that the former German monarch has not souped Gott with himself as an equal, an abettor, or perchance a servant.

One picture of the Kaiser sent out by the watchful Howell, Karl Rosner, showed William in the act of communion, and we are distinctly told that in that Belgian church with a waiting audience of German officers the worshipper never bent the knee. There is a strong contrast between him and the figure the Los Angeles Times draws of his conqueror, General Ferdinand Foch—"the Gray Man of Christ."

"Christ has been Christ's war," says the Times. "Christ on one side and all that stood opposed to Christ on the other side. And the Generalissimo, in supreme command of all the armies that fought on the side of Christ, is Christ's man."

Least readers think this a strange statement for a secular newspaper to make. The Times brings forward the reminder that "it is the business of newspaper to get at facts, and if the facts are of a supernatural nature, it is still the business of the newspaper to get at them and to record them." When this was written the full span of General Foch's achievement had not been covered, but the laborer with both legs paralyzed learned to run twenty looms unaided.

The monograph quotes from the report of the Canadian director of vocational training to show that disabled soldiers, who were common laborers before the war are earning $200 a month as foremen, skilled mechanics and workmen in many skilled trades.

Job Best Fitted for Him. "The worst mistake a disabled man can make is to drift into a low-grade, unskilled occupation," says the soldiers' monograph. "Without any training he must compete with a normal man in a line of work where brute strength and physical fitness are the main requirements."

"Whoever does not realize this and see clearly as a fact, he does but blunder stupidly.

There will be a growing company of critics when the war is ended and they will all be filled with the ego of their own conclusions. They will attempt to explain the genius of Foch with maps and diagrams. But, while they are doing so, if you will look for Foch in some quiet church, it is there that he will be found humbly giving God the glory, and absolutely declining to attribute it to himself.

"Can you think of a man who is a practical soldier but also a practical Christian? And is Foch that kind of a man? Let us see."

The secret of where Foch used to go for "strength and magical power to bring home the marvelous victories" was surprised by a California boy. It was not published by any organ of France, to show the world how "religious" its leader was.

"A California boy serving as a soldier in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, has recently written a letter to his parents in San Bernardino, in which he gives as well as any one else could give, the answer to the question we ask.

"This American boy—Evans by name—tells of meeting General Foch at close range in France. Evans had gone into an old church to have a look at it, and as he stood there with bared head satisfying his respectful curiosity, a gray man with the shabby uniform of a general also entered the church. Only one orderly accompanied the quiet gray man. No glittering staff of officers, no entourage of gold-laced aids, wars with him; nobody but just the orderly.

"Evans paid small attention at first to gray man, but was curious to see him kneel in the church praying. The minutes passed until full three-quarters of an hour had gone by before the gray man arose from his knees.

"The Evans followed him down the street and was surprised to see the soldiers salute this man in great excitement, and women and children stopping in their tracks with awestruck faces as he passed.

"It was Foch. And now Evans, of San Bernardino, counts the experience as the greatest in his life. During that three-quarters of an hour the Generalissimo of all the Allied armies was on his knees in humble supplication. In that quiet church 10,000 guns were roaring at his word on a hundred hills that rocked with death. "Millions of armed men crouched in trenches or rushed across blood-drenched terraces at his command, generals, artillery, cavalry, engineers, tanks, fought and wrought across the map of Europe absolutely as he commanded them to do, and in no other manner, as he went into that little church to pray.

"Nor was it an unusual thing for General Foch to do. There is no day that he does not do the same thing if there be a church that he can reach. He never fails to spend an hour on his knees every morning that he awakes from sleep; and every night it is the same.

"Moreover, it is not a new thing with him. He has done it his whole life long.

If young Evans could have followed the General on to headquarters, where reports were awaiting him and the news of victory was piled high before him, he would doubtless have seen a great gladness on the General's face, but he would have seen no look of surprise there.

"Men who do that which Foch does, have no doubts. When Premier Clemenceau, the Tiger of France, stood on the battle front with anxious heart, one look at the face of Foch stilled all his fears. He returned to Paris with the vision of sure and certain victory.

"The great generalissimo, General Foch, did not do that.

"The facts, then in the rear are that when the freedom of the world hung in the balance the world turned to Foch as the one great genius who could save it against the Hun; and that Foch, who is, perhaps, the greatest soldier the world has produced, is first of all a Christian.

"Young Evans of San Bernardino, just an every-day American boy, under the shadow of old San Geronimo, spent nearly an hour with Foch in the old French church, and not even one bayonet was there to keep them apart.

They represented the two great democracies of the world, but there in that old church they represented, jointly a far greater thing—the democracy of Christ."
