HAPPY PETERSBURG

Those gentle old folk of Petersburg who were too polite to express distaste for the coming of so many outsiders into the crowded confines of the Cockade City...

The old Virginia country has had an awful time during the last decade. Until ten years ago it was the quiet streets of Petersburg were the haunts of only the old stock except for the few who had been attracted there by the general trunk and bag factories and tobacco plants.

Tarheels delivered the first blow to their sensibilities when it banished from its land the saloons and distilleries. That act made Petersburg the center of wholesale liquor traffic and the Mecca toward which all Tarheel followers of Bacchus turned their faces when they became thirsty.

While liquor was still attracting attention to the town, Hopewell sprung like a mushroom into being within striking distance of Byramore Street. Then it was that polite folk shuddered. The mining camp had come out of the west and threatened to tear down all that had been built in two centuries.

In the interim between the opening of Hopewell and the building of Camp Lee the saloons were closed. That helped some, but a brisk bootlegging business had been established for the convenience of the Yankee boys who came down for training.

Now—happy day—comes the news that Camp Lee is to be no more. Petersburg merchants will suffer of course. But Petersburg was not built for the merchants. They followed the regular folk. And the regular folk don't care a dang what becomes of mere tradesmen so long as the sacred pavements of Sycamore and Washington streets are not to be trodden by the profane heel of the outsider.

Petersburg never did want progress. Railroads, factories and things were all right for such upstart towns as Richmond, Norfolk and other Virginia cities. But Petersburg! Petersburg, sub, is the home of gentle folk; not a place for the grime of industry.

HERE'S HOPIN' ANYWAY

No legislature of recent years has had so many major matters to come before it for consideration than will come before the one which began its sixty-day session Wednesday morning in Raleigh. Among the more important measures to be presented are those which seek to provide for improvement of educational facilities and the building of a great system of highways throughout the State.

Certain it is that both of these measures will be bitterly fought. There will be opponents who seek to make political capital from their opposition; there too will be sincere men who will fight them because the sums needed appear to them to be beyond the ability of the people to pay.

However, it is admitted by all students of economic questions that the present is the best time to build roads and public buildings. Material is plentiful and labor can be had for most any price. This condition will not last longer than the time it takes the nation to settle back into normal activities. The State can get twice as much for its dollars now as it will be able to get two years hence.

We have no idea that the school or the road forces will get what they ask for from the law makers of North Carolina. But we do hope that they will get enough to start them toward the goal they are seeking to attain.

AUDITORS AND TREASURERS

Several years ago there was a widespread sentiment for the abolition of county treasurer's offices throughout North Carolina. Several counties—namely Harnett—had the legislature to abolish these offices on the theory that drafts and orders could be issued so readily against banks as they could be against the treasurer. The theory worked fine in practice and so far as we know satisfied everybody.

But, in those counties which abolished the office there has come a new officer—some times at a larger salary than that paid the old treasurer. He is the auditor.

Nobody knows better than The Dispatch that an audit of public accounts is needed in justice to office holders and to the public. But it seems that North Carolina pays a big price for the auditing. There are one hundred counties in the State. A conservative estimate of the cost of auditors where they have displaced treasurers and treasurers where they are still employed would place the figure well beyond the $200,000 annually.

This is an evil, as we see it. And here is the remedy: Have the present legislature abolish every county treasurer's and county auditor's office in the state and substitute for them a State auditing bureau from which expert auditors could be sent to every county seat at least once a year. The cost of such a bureau would not be one-tenth that of the present system. The sums saved could go to the schools and roads.

Secretary Riddle has for some time been in communication with a body of California poultry ranchers who are contemplating a removal of their activities to North Carolina. Some time this Spring, several of the poultrymen will visit Dunn and other Eastern North Carolina towns in the near future. They require small farms suited to the raising of chickens and other poultry. There is much land of this nature around Dunn. It will be well for our folk to begin now to plan for the visit of this advance guard.
