

THE LITTLE HOUSE
 Little House That Might Have Been,
 waiting through the years,
 Smiling to the blue-blue hills
 through the spring-sweet weather.
 Never shall the step of Care, slipping Doubt of To-morrow Wake your quiet garden-path where we talked together.

Little House That Was To Be, I will
 go alone,
 Save for little laughing dreams
 clinging there beside me, Only they and I shall pass o'er your littlestons,
 Where the hawthorn-trees we set,
 Light white stars to guide me.

We shall sweep the dusty hearth, rub
 the pewter bright,
 Wake the empty rooms to cheer,
 set the tapers gleaming,
 Wait until his footstep stirs, echoed
 through the night,
 From the Land of Heart's Desire
 across the Hills of Dreaming.

Little House That Never Was, I will
 learn to smile,
 Fare the dawn with bravery, the
 dusk without regretting,
 If in star-time now and then I may steal a while
 To the comfort of your hearth, alone and unforgetting.

—Martha Haskell Clark, in The Designer.

THE SKY-GOER
 He understood what it is that we are trying to work out.
 He was very old, and from the secret
 swing of planets.
 To the secret delectables in human hearts, he understood.
 I used to watch him watering his lawn, scattering the food for the woodpecker,
 Sweeping the crowing before his house. It was not that there was light
 About him, visible to the eye, as in the old paintings.
 Rather, an influence came from him
 in little breaths,
 When we were with him we became other.

He saw us all as if we were that which we dreamed ourselves.
 He saw the town already clothed on for its tomorrow.
 He saw the world, beating like a heart, beating like a heart.
 "How may I, too, know?" I wanted to cry to him. Instead I only said: "And how is it with you?" But he answered Both questions by the look in his eyes. For he had come to quietness.

He had come to the place where sun
 and moon meet
 And where the spaces of the heavens
 open their doors.
 He was understanding and love and the silence.
 He was the voice of these, as he fed
 the woodpecker.
