With his well directed poisonous dart, Has embittered many a joyous rife And broken many a virtuous heart."

In view of the great amount of good he wrought in his life-time, charity would have condoned and forgiven the weakness or fault or whatever it was that provoked criticism.

Charity, we are told, is the paramount virtue. All else is as sounding brass and tinckling cymbal. Charity suffereth long and is kind. It never persecutes or backbites.

Charity draws the curtain to hide a neighbor's fault; turns a deaf car to the tongue of scandal and heals the wounds made by the poisoned arrows of hate. Charity endureth forever and its supreme example was given us from the Cross when the Savior prayel: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."
