INGOME AND OUTGO" ing takes place, the children in turn pass from grade to grade. Due to varying causes this progress through the grades varies widely, some children learn more quickly than others, some make very little progress, while others do not have an opportunity equivalent or equal to that provided others. Thus we have at the end of high school an "outgo" of approximately 16,000 children.

Of course, the potentialities of children's intellectual ability cannot be measured very scientifically. The process of learning and development to records more than children are annually enrolled in grade. A large part of children are entering school for the first time. They are being initiated into a new world as it were. New contacts are being made and new ideas are gathered. By these additional ideas they gradually acquire new ways of thinking. These are "income" children.
