More Than A Million People Gaze On Declaration Of Independence Each Year

The Declaration of Independence signed on July 4, 1776, in old Independence Hall, Philadelphia, now rests on the second floor of the Library of Congress, covered by a coat of gelatin to prevent further injury to it. More than a million people each year pause before the famous document and gaze at it with patriotic reverence. Most of the signatures on the aged document are indistinguishable, but heading the list is one name written in large letters. It stands out clearly and can be read with ease. It is the name of John Hancock of Massachusetts, who, when he signed the Declaration, said he was going to "write it large so King George can read it without his spectacles." John Hancock was a rich man and had much to lose by the stand he took against Britain. A price was put on his head for his "treason" against the King, but John Hancock didn't seem to care in the least. He only increased his opposition toward Britain. He took an active part in all the affairs of the colonies during the period of the Revolution. Appointed to a committee after the Boston Massacre to ask the king to withdraw, Hancock advocated every honorable means to avoid the impending conflict; yet delivered a funeral oration over the slain Bostonians in which he condemned the cowardice of the British officers in killing unarmed men. John Hancock was a delegate from Massachusetts to the Continental Congress and served as its president from 1775-77. While he held this position, he became so aroused over the contest between the colonies and Britain that he asked to be released from Congress so that he might join the colonial army. Congress, however, refused to let him go. In 1777, five years after the war had closed, John Hancock was elected governor of his own state, Massachusetts, which office he held until his death. Several years later the state of Massachusetts erected a magnificent monument over the grave of its most illustrious son, John Hancock. That monument is still over his grave in the Old Granary Burying ground in Boston. Among those fishing at Lake Santeetlah during the week were Rev. J. M. Woodard, Talmadge Woodard, Mr. Harley DeHart, of Canton, and his son, Paul.

Among those who composed the singing party Saturday were Mrs. Whisenhunt, Mr. Roy Ruff, and Mr. Howard Robinson. Mrs. Fred Williams and her family of Alcoa, Tenn., spent the week-end at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Shields. The congress just adjourned a peace time record for spending $10,000,000,000 appropriated $800,000,000 in new taxes. NOTICE OF TRUSTEES SALE UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF DEED OF TRUST, executed by E. J.
