"The Breath of Life"

Patrolman McLoughlin

This dramatic picture illustrates how Patrolman Thomas McLoughlin of New York revived five-month-old Joseph Alteri after the baby had smothered himself by pulling a pillow over his head. Summoned by screams of the child's terrified mother, the quick-thinking patrolman literally "breathed life" back into the little body.

Just who brought the first red clover to the New World is still a question, but records in the United States Department of Agriculture report that many men famous in colonial history urged its growth.

As early as 1633, Lord Baltimore asked his settlers to bring good clovers of clover seed, but there is no record that they did. William Penn in 1682 tells of success in growing English grass (red clover) and that Robert Taftner, a wealthy merchant planter, sowed "great and small clover."

Benjamin Franklin, about 1750, wrote that he has "sowed 30 acres to red clover in Philadelphia on the 23rd of August." Nearly 25 years later his "Poor Richard's Almanac" told of "An experienced method of sowing clover on barley."

George Washington in 1786 wrote that seed of red clover was obtainable "on easy terms" in Virginia. It was in these years—the reconstruction period after the Revolution—that extensive cultivation of clover began.

Students of genetics in the United States Department of Agriculture call maize, or Indian Corn, "the most completely domesticated grain, quite incapable of maintaining itself without man." None of the Old World cereals such as wheat, barley, or rice, has reached this high degree of dependence on human care, says J. H. Kempton of the Bureau of Plant Industry.

"How, when, and where corn was domesticated are three questions, not even asked but never answered," he says. "Though there is corn of primitive people, there is no such thing as primitive corn. The oldest varieties known are as highly developed but annually and as completely divorced from wild plants as the best of our commercial varieties."

"The most ancient corn known is one of the pre-Inca, of Peru. Well preserved ears in the graves of those people duplicate the varieties grown in the same region today. A thousand or more generations have made no changes. Charred corn from the Mound Builders of the Ohio Valley resemble corn grown by Indians in the Middle West."

The nearest relative to Indian corn known to botanists is the grass generally known by its Aztec name of teosinte. But if corn was developed from teosinte, Mr. Kempton says, the manner of development can only be surmised. It is believed, however, that the advance of genetic knowledge may unravel the mystery of maize.

Forecasts of the quantity of bonus bonds that would flow directly into trade channels following receipt by the veterans have not materialized. But two-thirds of the bond issue of $1,718,000,000 distributed thus far has been cashed.

Cotton may find new uses in the construction of roads. This use of cotton is being developed by AAA by gratis distribution to 24 States of a new cotton fabric which is being used experimentally to re-enforce nearly 600 miles of bituminous-surfaced roads.

High schools and colleges now for first time can get specialized help from the Federal Government in preparing educational radio programs. A series of historical scripts called "Interview with the Past," a production manual, a glossary of radio terms, incidental theme music and bibliographies are available upon request from the United States Office of Education.

Radio broadcasting, as analyzed by the Commerce Department is shown to be limbing toward the big industry class. Total revenues last year of 561 stations (including all but three minor commercial stations)
