Danger In Home-Made Electric Fence Cited

A warning to North Carolina farmers to beware of the home-made electric fence has been issued by David S. Weaver, head of the Department of Agricultural Engineering and Extension specialist of State College. He says that all electric fences present an element of danger, but that the home-made device which does not limit the amount of current and which does not include a fool-proof controller to interrupt the flow of electricity, is especially lethal.

"The recent death of a Wilson County child who was electrocuted by a fence on his father's farm focused attention on the electric fence now being widely used to restrain livestock in the state," Prof. Weaver stated. "I wish to reiterate the position of my department, and that of the entire State College Extension Service, that all electric fences present definite safety problems, but homemade electric fence devices are especially dangerous.

The State College man said that the Wilson County child died as a result of coming in contact with a home-made electric fence, which did not allow for the fence wire to be charged intermittently, and which had only a small electric bulb to reduce the amount of current from a 110 volt line.

Electric fences manufactured by reliable companies restrict the amount of current, and interrupt the current at regular intervals in order that a person or animal may be freed from contact with the charged wire, usually without fatal damage.

"I repeat the warning which we have frequently issued that an electric fence is extremely dangerous unless it is properly made, correctly installed, and carefully used," Weaver said.

Wooden knife racks and wooden partitions fitted into cupboard drawers make for efficiency in the kitchen. They keep the articles in good condition and within sight.
