- Blackie Bear -

By D. SAM COX

THE CHILDREN LEARN SOMETHING ABOUT BUGS

For two or three days after Dr. Coon had melted them apart, Benny and Jenny didn't cut up very much. The spots on their backs where the hair had pulled so were still sore, and they felt more like just lying around in the sun than they did like frolicking.

Maybe you remember that Blackie ate bees and honey all together that day when the log broke and turned out all that honey. The mouth of a grown bear is awfully tough, and bees can't hurt him. Well, Jenny and Benny thought they could eat anything that their daddy could, and, besides, they had been catching butterflies all along and hadn't been hurt. They didn't know that there was any difference between a bee and butterfly except that they didn't look alike.

So the first day they felt like frolicking around they went out into the garden and ran after some big yellow butterflies till they caught them. And then Jenny saw the bee gum, with a lot of bees going in and out as they packed more honey away for the winter.

You children know that your mouths are not as tough as your daddy's, for you have seen him drink coffee when it was so hot it would burn your hands. Those bear children hadn't learned this yet, and they thought they could put anything in their mouths that anybody else could. So, when Jenny saw the bees crawling in and out of the gum, and flying out and settling on the flowers, she said, "Let's catch some of these bugs."

Benny was right ready to do anything, and so they began jumping up and snapping at the bees when they would come out of their house to go for some more honey. Bees fly mighty fast, and it's not nearly so easy to catch them as it is to catch butterflies, that seem to just dance in the same place and never get very far. The children snapped at several bees before they caught one, and then both caught a bee at the same time. And they did something else at the same time. They screamed. A bee is in a hurry about everything he does, and by the time these children had snapped their jaws together with a bee inside, they felt that hot sting of a bee that burns worse than fire. Did they keep their mouths shut? They did not. They gave those bees plenty of room to come out, and they came.

But they left the fire behind them, and it was almost funny to see those cubs scratching at their mouths, trying to get the fire out. The noise they made soon had Betty and all the others running out to see what was the matter. There was no need to tell Dr. Coon anything, he had treated just such cases before, and he knew what to do. He mixed up some greasy looking stuff from his medicine chest and rubbed it on the tongues where the bees had stung the children.
