REA Inaugurates Drive For Better Food For Defense

The Rural Electrification co-operatives throughout the country are destined to play a major role in the defense program according to J. C. Moore, superintendent of the Cruso Electric Membership Corporation, who returned Sunday from Washington, D. C., where he attended a conference on rural electrification and food for defense.

Representatives from rural electrification groups from Maine to North Carolina attended what is known as a regional conference, the one last week is the only such meeting to be held in Washington, the others in the central part in the areas.

Mr. Moore states that it was brought out in the conference that Americans are physically in a condition of which we nationally should recognize as dangerous and which we should make immediate positive and vigorous measures to correct.

Those attending the conference pledged full support to the President in mobilizing the national food resources, not only to meet the present emergency, but to formulate plans and carry through a national program of nutrition, according to Mr. Moore.

The chief article of food discussed was wheat and the part that the Rural Electrification Administration could play in advocating home and community milling as a contribution towards solving the problem of malnutrition so far as wheat bread and cereals are concerned.

All type of equipment were demonstrated in small wheat mills for grinding flour. School cafeterias were advised to grind their own wheat, thereby keeping in the flour the vitamins that are usually taken out and resold in other forms.

Mr. Moore says that it was brought out that the American citizens are giving on an average of only one hour out of 8 working hours for defense, while the Germans are working from 4 to 6 hours for national causes.

Through the REA the rural schools may obtain information regarding various forms of equipment for promoting food defense programs, according to Mr. Moore.

Others attending the conference from this county were: Chas. B. McCrary and W. Tom Rainer, both directors of the Cruso Electric Membership Corporation.
