Chas. Curtis, Jr. Wins Bronze Star

By his heroic devotion to duty and his display of professional knowledge, Sgt. Curtis forced a withdrawal on the part of the enemy.

The citation of the bronze oak leaf cluster read in part as follows: "Sgt. Curtis was assigned to duty as a machine gun section leader with an infantry unit engaged in a bitter fire fight with a stubbornly resisting foe. The enemy was effectively using machine gun and mortar fires from well emplaced gun positions on commanding terrain, and our attack was brought to a standstill by the ferocious hostile fire which caused heavy casualties in our ranks. With complete disregard for his personal safety, Sgt. Curtis exposed himself to the hostile fire by evacuating seriously wounded men to an aid station. The unselfish loyalty to his fellow soldiers and the indomitable courage displayed by Sgt. Curtis reflect great credit to himself and the armed forces."

Sgt. Curtis, son of Mrs. Mary Curtis, of Waynesville, entered the service as a volunteer and left here with Company "H". His wife is the former Miss Edna Carver, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. D. Carver, of Waynesville.

R. H. Percy, inspector, and Maj. F. J. Akins, adjutant.

Sgt. Medford, who entered the army on his 28th birthday July 28, 1942, landed in France on D-day with the hard fighting 82nd Airborne division and soon earned the respect and praise of his superior officers in the many battles which raged until the main force invaded the continent.

Maj. Gen. James M. Gavin, commanding general of the 82nd, in writing to the Medfords about the death of their son, stated: "Sgt. Medford was operations sergeant at the time of his death and was giving his men orders to clean out enemy machine gun nests. He was a model non-commissioned officer, who displayed the best qualities of leadership, courage, fearlessness and devotion to duty. Your son was well-liked by all and his friendly manners had made him many friends who will be guided by his inspiration in the hard days ahead."

Col. Roy E. Lindquist, of Medford's regiment, wrote: "Your son died as a soldier and a hero performing his duty only as a paratrooper can for his regiment and his country."

"Only fighting soldiers such as your son could have made possible the breaching and penetration of the continental defenses."

Col. Lindquist also informed the family that Sgt. Medford's unit had been awarded the Distinguished Unit citation for their outstanding heroism on June 6 in the invasion of France.

Sgt. Medford was one of a group of paratroopers inspected and praised by Prime Minister Winston Churchill and Gen. Dwight Eisenhower.

Before entering the army, Medford worked on his father's stock farm.
