Bombing Blitz Fails to Level 'London Town'

If the people of London had not been tough enough to endure the terrible bombing raids that scourged the metropolis almost nightly from August, 1940, until May, 1941, the Battle of Britain probably would have been lost in that black period. Had the capital city faltered, the rest of Britain would have been tempted to waver, and a demand for peace arisen. But the stern-willed Londoners took the worst that the German Luftwaffe could hurl at them. They picked up their wounded and dead, pat out the fires, cleared the streets, and started on.

On September 2 the German sent 500 planes over the city in an attempt to knock out radio transmitters. September 8 there were three raids within 24 hours. So it went, day after day. During August 1,075 civilians were killed in London, and 1,261 injured. When the blitz was stepped up in September, these August losses seemed small. Three hundred and eighty persons were killed on September 7, and 228 on September 8.

As the autumn went on, the death toll mounted to thousands, and the injured to many thousands. Fires raged continually. Whole blocks of buildings were destroyed. Ancient landmarks went down in heaps of rubble. Londoners spent every night in uncomfortable air raid shelters. Women and children were rescued to the country.

Britain Strikes Back.
Meanwhile, however, Britain was striking back. The small but excellent Royal Air Force, equipped with a superior fighter plane, the Spitfire, was knocking out many lightly armored German bombers and fighters. RAF interceptors proved so successful that the German air force had to realize that the Luftwaffe could not sustain such losses as it had been taking. On the memorable Sunday of September 15, British Spitfires shot down the Nazi plane out of a stream of 400. That victory turned the tide. Soon thereafter the German layered off their daylight raids and turned to night bombing.

For this terror too the London defenders were ready. With searchlights and anti-aircraft guns they blasted the German raiders from the skies, although the city suffered severely. Four thousand tons of bombs that were dropped in spite of the valiant defenders. The RAF soon met the threat with a new plane designed for night flying. Radar locators were also employed successfully to warn of raids.

So all through the winter of 1940-41 the people of London held grimly on, keeping up their courage while ugly death was always very close. Several times in those cold dark months invasion appeared imminent.

The winter lull gave some respite, but by the middle of March the day and night attacks were again in full swing. In May the last tremendous effort came. London had a two-day raid on May 10 and 11, and again on the 16th, an attack of lesser intensity.
Soon after this it was noted that German planes were skirting the city, aware of its increasingly formidable defenses. The RAF was growing constantly, and American aid was beginning to be evident. While London had been bombed frequently since May of 1941, there have been no more raids of this magnitude. London survived the fury of the direct German attack through the bulldoze courage of its common people, and the valour of the Royal Air Force.

This Put America Into Global Warfare

Submarine Warfare Whipped

At the start of the war considerable damage was done by submarines as shown in the towering pillar of smoke which announced the end of one of the cargo ships. Use of convoys and strong air protection together with the use of secret weapons whipped the submarine menace after many late months. Then the full strength of U. S. productive power poured in a constant stream across the Atlantic to the pre-invasion bases.

Farm Questions and Answers

Question: How can I kill poison ivy?
Answer: Use a solution of sodium chlorate, made at the rate of one pound of the material to the gallon of water, and spray it on the plants, says Prof. B. W. Wells of the Botany Department at State College. He also reports that a new and very effective chemical called ammonium sulfamate has been developed recently, but it is not available at this time. As to the sodium chlorate, Prof. Wells warns that this chemical is very active and must be kept away from fire at all times. It should never be stored near sulphur. It must be kept off the clothing.

Question: Should breeding cockerels be dubbed?
Answer: This is especially necessary for the breeds that develop large combs and wattles, says C. F. Parrish in charge of Extension poultry at State College. Dubbing reduces fighting and picking, following the tear of combs and wattles. It permits the cockerel to seat out of hoppers more easily. Dubber cockerels give better fertility, which makes for higher hatchability of eggs, because of the better physical condition of the bird. In dubbing, hold the head of the cockerel firmly in an erect position. With a small pair of strong scissors, cut the wattles close to the neck as they hang. Cut the comb by starting at the rear and cutting toward the front, at a point where the comb widens out on top of the head. Dub cockerels at about 8 to 10 weeks of age and on a warm day to reduce bleeding.

Question: Can I raise queen bees and nuclei for sale?
Answer: Queen rearing and breeding is a very specialized job, says Prof. Ross O. Stevens, of the Zoology Department at State College. The problem is to get the young queens properly mated when they leave the colony at about six days of age. Even though you produce a large number of good drones in your colonies, the chances of a mating with one of your bees is not very great. Probably there are all kinds of bees in your territory.
