Timely, Practical

Household Suggestions

By RUTH CURRENT
N. S. State College

Food specialists say there is more waste than overstocking and careless marketing. You can't tell from the looks of a food how far it can jump and you can't tell the value of all food by its appearance. Many tons of fruit with slight blemishes are ignored by the customer and left to rot, contaminate other fruit, and eventually be thrown away by the retailer. Many of these not so perfect or well-complexioned fruits have equal taste and nutritive value with their more attractive companions.

And another good rule for shoppers that saves food is a hands-off policy when it comes to pinching, prodding, and pommeling sound fruits and vegetables. Handling causes rot and results in waste.

Many people throw away the leaves of cauliflower, endive, and chard without thinking of the tasty nutrition lost by failing to put them in stews and soups. Many a tasty healthful dish goes by the wayside if the cook is unwilling to try new recipes that can turn leftovers or not overly popular vegetables into a delicious dish.

A little foresight in purchasing, careful planning of meals, and conservation in the kitchen and at the table are just good sense. It not only makes for more adequate, well-balanced diets but in these days it saves the lives of millions of men, women, and children who are dying of hunger over the face of this earth of ours.
