Cow's Production Is Dependent Upon Owner's Treatment

High milk production records are possible only when there is a real partnership existing between the farmer and his dairy herd. These records are a joint result of the cow's own ability to produce and the feed and conditions she is subjected to.

First we must begin with a good cow. One which has the ability to produce enough milk and butterfat to more than pay for the feed she consumes. Select the cow that is free from disease at least average size for her breed, has well-sprung fore ribs and a large body that indicates plenty of capacity, a refined, clean-cut head and neck, a straight back, and a fairly large udder that is evenly hung with large milk veins.

This is only half the partnership, however. The farmer is the other half and must provide the good conditions that enable the cow to do her best.

Some dairymen make the mistake of feeding all cows in the herd the same amount of grain mixture. This practice under-feeds the high producers and reduces milk flow. It over-feeds the low producers and, since they can't turn the extra feed into milk, they turn it into fat or waste it. Give the best cows the best feed at least a pound of grain for each three to five pounds of milk produced, says John Avey, in charge of Extension Dairying at State College.

Provide good clean, full with plenty of fresh water and clean bedding. Don't let cows stifle for themselves, provide them with plenty of good pasture and roughage all year.
