Sanitarian Jones Gives Dish Sterilization Data To Haywood Eating Places

By O. B. JONES, Sanitarian

The majority of the restaurants and eating places in Haywood county are doing a very good job of sterilizing the dishes, glasses and other utensils which are used in dispensing food to the public. There are a few exceptions. During the past two months it has been necessary to close two such places for the reason that they are potential spreaders of disease.

Most of the eating places where proper sterilization of dishes where proper sterilization of dishes is not being done do not have enough water. To sterilize properly, that is to completely kill disease producing bacteria, water must be at a temperature of at least 170 degrees Fahrenheit and must be kept at that temperature during the operation. The sterilizing process requires that the dishes and utensils be immersed for at least two minutes in water at 170 degrees. Perhaps it would be safer to heat the water to 180 degrees, especially where there is not a booster heating unit attached to the sink. This would allow for a certain amount of cooling which takes place while the utensils are being treated.

A number of restaurants have installed electric water heaters. Some of these are too small to maintain a constant supply of water at the right temperature, some of them will not even raise the temperature to 170 degrees. In many instances this deficiency may be overcome by installing the proper size electric or gas booster heating unit. They are usually attached to the third compartment of the washing sink. They are being manufactured at the present time in sufficient quantity to be readily available.

Another possible source of contamination is the drying of dishes and utensils with dish cloths. Only a very few restaurants employ this means of drying dishes. Health departments discourage this outdated method because of its possibilities of spreading disease. When there is an abundance of hot water at 170 or 180 degrees for sterilizing, the drying of dishes with cloths is not necessary. The heat they absorb during the two or three minutes they are immersed will evaporate the moisture and leave them perfectly dry and shining clean. The dishes must be lowered into the hot water in wire baskets with long handles; then left on the draining board to dry.

Of course, a prerequisite to the thorough sterilization is careful washing and rinsing in a three compartment sink large enough to completely immerse the utensils. Most of our restaurants are equipped with three compartment sinks. Perhaps the greatest immediate need is really hot water.
