NEW ATOM SMASHER DEVELOPED

A PILOT MODEL of their new atom smasher, "the Yale linear accelerator," is displayed at New Haven, Conn., by two of its builders: Howard L. Schultz (left), assistant professor of physics and Carol Montgomery, an associate professor. They expect by next June to be developing energies of from 15 to 20,000,000 volts. It may prove a great aid to nuclear physics since, thanks to the "accelerator," the product has less energy loss than the cyclotron or betatron. (International)
