MORE ABOUT Modern Store

Special spotlights throughout the ceiling are spotted on the several display "serve-yourself cases."

The prescription department is of a special design, with an open-view of the entire department. The arrangement of shelves, drawers and lights were designed for efficient operation. The underside of the shelves are lined with a row of fluorescent lights. A special item in the department is a sink with hot and cold water. The prescription department is "gated" off from the general public, yet the "open-view" type front was utilized.

The floors of the building are of infant tile, and the ceiling is of acoustical board, with modernistic double rows of fluorescent lights.

The rear of the building is devoted to storage rooms, and a room for the compressors used on the soda fountain.

A large oil heating unit is installed in a separate room, and two large rest rooms are also in the back part of the building.

The store has a side entrance from the Church Street side, and magazine racks and newspapers are on display at this entrance.

The new store will have about three times the stock of the former store, with many new items added to several of the departments.

Just opposite the soda fountain are a number of booths, made of oak which match the remainder of the fixtures in the store.

The front of the store has two large floor level windows, but these will not be used for display purposes, it was explained, as the light will be worth more since all merchandise will be on display, and very little behind the counters.

Lawrence Olivier Proves 'Hamlet' Can Be Exciting

BY GENE HANDSMAKER

HOLLYWOOD Shakespeare devotees will find Laurence Olivier's movie "Hamlet" an exciting thing to watch. So will folks to whom the Bard was required high school reading that one, some time, really ought to know better.

The English-made film has majestic sweep and power. Oliver, as the melancholy Danish prince, is magnificent. He's tender or confused, bitter, jocular, or savage, with equal facility. In the startling meeting with his father's ghost atop Elsinore castle, in the subdued "To be or not to be" soliloquy, in his clashing duel with Laertes, Olivier, in voice, gesture, and expression, is in full command.

Around him is a superb cast—Jean Simmons as the sensitive and finally mad Ophelia; Eileen Herlie as the queen, Hamlet's wretched mother; Basil Sydney as his murderous uncle, the king; Felix Aylmer is a smoothly conniving old Polonius; Norman Wood and a faithful Horatio; Terence Morgan as fiery Laertes. Stanley Holloway is a refreshingly ebullient digger in a grisly graveyard.

Technical accomplishments are outstanding except for some close-ups of Ophelia that are too harshly black and white. The grim and barren castle, through which the camera roams at will, is a most effective setting. Sound effects to herald the ghost's arrival, including an amplified heartlike tomtom, are almost overpoweringly forceful.

Now to the comparative ridiculous "Abbott and Costello Meet Frankenstein." Bud and Lou operate a trench office. Corn, hokum, lots of shriek by Lou, plenty of laughs for kids from nine to ninety.

Bottle-Type Feeding Tried On Calves

FERGUS FALLS, Minn. (UP)—In Ocker Tail county, they're making "bottle babies" out of calves and saving money, labor, butterfat and grain.

Dr. H. J. Larson, Fergus Falls veterinarian, knew that nursing calves cut cow-cannor production to nothing. He also knew that letting calves drink from pails often resulted in "rot-bellied" calves and sometimes resulted in scours (dysentery) and pneumonia.

Larson fixed a contraption that consists of a large nipple on the end of a tube connected with a pail of milk. He placed the nipple in a frame at udder-height for the calf, which nursed the mechanical "mother" instead of its true mother.

Some 200 farmers who have tried the method claim it makes the calves develop better than feeding from their own mothers.

One-half cup of canned salmon added to an omelette recipe will provide an appetizing change for a meatless day. Serve with tomato sauce.
