Ornithory Delight

Gay study coat.

By VERA WINSTON

HERE IS SOMETHING new and gay for campus life. It is a so-called study coat, but we imagine that it is more likely to find itself in use for lounging or for brunch. Bright green suede cloth is set off by a leopard-printed velvet collar and cuffs. It flares out at back, and the seaming from the shoulders in front terminates in two patch pockets. Slippers of printed leopard to match make for a nice, cosy get-up.

Head Start For Sis

By BETTY CLARKE

AP Newsfeatures Beauty Editor

Little girls who do not enjoy going to the beauty salon but nevertheless are glamor conscious, can get a super hair shaping from Mom. It's all done with one of those little combination comb and blade gadgets. Most of these work on the same principle, and if directions are followed, excellent results can be obtained.

Usually, it is easier to shape the hair when it is wet or damp. Many of these directions stress that point. To begin with, hair is separated into sections, usually three across the crown, and three across the back of the head from the top of the ears and down. The back sections are tapered by starting about two inches from the scalp and stroking the comb-blade down with just enough pressure so you can feel the hair being shaped. Side sections are cut by holding locks out from the head and forward.

When hair is cut according to directions given, the taperette must be used again to smooth out stray lengths. If a child's hair shows a tendency to wave, the curl might be encouraged by shaping in that direction to encourage the wave.

Many women, now giving themselves home permanents, find they can get much better results by trimming the hair using this method. Many of them finish the shaping job after the permanent is given.

These comb-blade combinations can be used by Junior, too. He can comb his hair and trim it at the same time. All he does is comb the longer front hair down over his forehead until it is the desired length, then use it on his crown, sides and back as he would an ordinary comb.

Actually, the hair is not being cut at any time, just shaped by this method. It will help get rid of split ends and dried permanent ends in a jiffy, often given a surer, smoother curl to the hair.

Norwegians Send Liquor On Round-World Trip

MINEAPOLIS (UPI)—A group of Minneapolis Norwegians is sending a load of their native firewater on a boat trip around the world.

When it gets back home in November, 1949, they'll drink it.

The Norwegians are members of Torske Klubben, or Laneheon Club. The firewater is aquavit, a Norwegian liquor which burns going down.

In olden days, Norwegians aged their favorite potable by sealing it in a keg and sailing it around the world for a year. The ship's rocking and the climatic changes did things.

The Torske Klubben shipment was sealed reverently at the 15th anniversary meeting and sent to New York to begin its journey.
