Legless Stoves Draw Fire Of Cat Owners

ATLANTA (UP)—Cat-lovers have put their backs up today in an angry complaint that "modern progress" is ruining the domestic bliss of millions of tabbies and toms from coast to coast.

Specifically, the friends of the felines want kitchen equipment manufacturers to put the kitchen stove back up on four high, sturdy legs.

Cats these days, they said, have no backing place left in the American home.

When grandma eliminated her fireplace, they said, the family cat did not protest. He walked into the kitchen and curled up under the stove. But stove-makers lately have been encroaching on the cat's domain.

"And what do we get these days?" demanded an angry cat owner. "Stoves that look like boxes, great big things like packing crates and pint-sized things that look like water coolers."

"And they come right down to the floor, all of them. Where is the cat supposed to go?"

"The Cat Lovers' Society of South Geneva Street here was uncertain about how to go about getting stoves back off the floor."

"Maybe we'll use wooden blocks," one member said. "It might make cooking awkward, but who could keep her mind on cooking with a neurotic cat walking from a cold fireplace to a solid stove, looking for a place to light?"

Helen Hayes Excited About New Play

NASSAU, Bahamas (UP)—Helen Hayes is a little excited about her next play.

It will be William McCleery's "Good Housekeeping." Miss Hayes will play the mother. In the play, she'll have two daughters. One of them will be her real-life daughter, Mary, who was graduated last month from the American Academy of Dramatic Arts.

"I don't know which of us is going to be most nervous," Miss Hayes, in private life Mrs. Charles MacArthur, admitted.

Mary made her debut with her mother in a summer stock production of "Alice Sit by the Fire."

"Of course, I blew my lines," Mrs. MacArthur recalls. "Mary was as steady as a rock."

Here for a family vacation, Mrs. MacArthur disclosed plans for the

Expert Declares Farm Prices May Drop Lower

Farmers will have to keep a close eye on all of their operations this year if they expect to maintain their net income at present levels, says T. K. Jones, farm management analyst at State College.

Continued high production cost and declining prices for agricultural products are in store for 1949, Jones says. Lower net income will mean that farm families will be forced to accept lower standards of living. It families are to avoid this reduction in living standards, they must develop plans to curry-out of "Good Housekeeping" in August at Dennis, Mass. If the play lives up to expectations, it will be taken to New York in the fall.

the effect of falling farm prices. Most farmers have the alternative of increasing the efficiency of present enterprises or adding supplementary enterprises which can be fitted into present farming systems, according to the analyst.

He points out that efficiency can be increased by the use of recommended practices on all enterprises. Many farmers use recommended practices on the main crop, such as tobacco, but neglect other enterprises and fail to operate them in such a way as to obtain a profit.

On many farms, says Jones, a fuller use of the resources of land, labor, and capital could be obtained by adding other enterprises. The choice of the kind of supplementary enterprises to add will be governed by market demand and available resources.

Increasing livestock enterprises offers a good opportunity for making adjustments in view of the
