

Fish Have No Ears But Some Hear Better Than Us

NEW YORK—Some fish can hear very well, even better than humans.

This is the finding of Dr. Karl von Frisch, the Austrian zoologist. Some fish can tell the difference between notes as close as two notes of a piano. And sometimes a fish can even learn the difference between different tones.

Dr. von Frisch trained blinded fish to respond to sound when he blew a note on a whistle above water. They came for food in response to that note but not to others.

The fish in water could hear tones barely audible in the air to human ears. A human, with his head in water, couldn't hear the same note as well as the fish.

Frish says the fish, like humans, respond to sound better than fish that live in the sea. The good hearing of fish have air bladder connected to their bones with their bones. The air bladders pick up the vibrations of sound.

Dr. von Frisch is most noted for his work in solving the curious language of the bees. This is a duty which a scout bee tells other bees how far away nearby flowers are, what direction, and even how good the pickings are.
