The danger of leaving the town ith only one truck and a skeleton force to fight a fire was revealed, he said, in the case of another town in eastern North Carolina this summer. While the firefighters of the town were out on a rural call, a valuable home in the town itself was destroyed by fire.

Asheville and other cities do aid in rural fire protection in their own and adjacent counties, he admitted, stations and keep enough equipment in reserve to take care of local emergencies while part of the fire force is out on a rural call

He pointed out, however, that a state attorney general's ruling now permits county governments to Tourists participate in fire protection pro-
