Children and Their Pets

By GARRY CLEVELAND MYERS, Ph.D.

THE young child, even as young as three or four, whose parents don't cause him to be afraid of lowly creatures, may gain a great deal in pleasure and useful information from observing these creatures or even from helping care for them as pets. But for a child so young to handle a tiny turtle, frog, newt or the like harms this creature and may cause it to die.

Children who can enjoy the open spaces may have great fun catching tadpoles or minnows and keeping them in water. Under proper guidance these children may learn much useful information and gain in moral growth. Otherwise they may hold the creature out of water, causing it to die, or leave it in unchanged or unbalanced water where it will perish. Obviously, the moral damage to the children then is very bad, indeed.

Two to Five
The child from two to five may handle a gentle cat or puppy very roughly, even torturing it for fun, unless this child is well guided in his relation to the pet. A mother writes of her son, four: "When he gets his cat he may play gently and lovingly, or he may blow in her ears and shout in glee. Or he may paint her nose with water colors. Once he put her down into the toilet. Another time he singed her whiskers at the gas stove. He has always been inclined to tease our dog, which had been a great pet in our family until our child was born. Our dog was extremely jealous of the baby and has only recently shown inclination to enjoy Robert's presence. In this child's teasing and sometimes cruel attitude to the dog a natural reaction to the dog's unfriendliness?"

In substance I wrote this mother: You are correct in being sorry for the cat and dog and wishing to protect them. But a much bigger problem is the moral damage to your son from your letting him torture these creatures. You could, of course, deprive you of means for educating him in proper treatment of such creatures.

Train the Child
As this matter is so important, you can afford to neglect practically all other things in order to train this child to be gentle toward these pets. You and Dad should devise a plan by which one of you parents will be on hand when either pet is exposed to this child. When you can't be right there during the next few weeks, be sure the pet is beyond the child's reach.

Always, when this lad tortures either pet, turn him over your knees and smack him with your bare flat hand on his bare thighs. Be sure it hurts and is immediate and that he never again can give the pet pain without receiving instant pain himself. After the youngster begins to respect your forbiddance of his cruelty, you can abandon spanking and substitute chair-sitting for 20 minutes as a penalty. (Good techniques in obedience are presented in my bulletin "How To Teach Child Meaning of No," to be had by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to me in care of this paper.) Use only your hand to effect forbiddance. You have already shrieked at him too much. But when he pets or strokes the pet or shows tenderness to it in any other way, praise him generously.

Mrs. Myers and I consider this problem of educating the child from his early years in kindness to dumb animals so important that we have devoted a large space to it in our forthcoming book, "Homes Build Persons."

Radio Speaker

DR. BACHMAN G. HODGE, pastor of the Centenary Methodist Church of Chattanooga, Tenn., will speak on Sunday's Methodist Hour program. The broadcast will be aired locally at 7:30 a.m.

Former Pastor To Preach At Methodist Church

The members of Waynesville First Methodist Church will hear a familiar voice preaching this morning's sermon.

Guest minister at the 11 o'clock worship service on Sunday, Sept. 24, will be the Rev. J. E. Yountz, former pastor of the Clay Madison, his former church. Mr. Madison now is pastor of First Methodist Church of Hickory.

Before that, he served as pastor of the First Methodist Church of Hickory.

The Rev. J. E. Yountz, pastor of the Waynesville church, said that invitation is extended to the entire congregation and to Madison's other friends to attend the service.

Countless birds, bears and bison were killed by the Mt. St. Helens eruption in 1912. Humans lived close enough to hurt.

Thought for Meditation

If you and I would crown this life, By keeping free, exempt from strife, Retain no envy in the heart, Bid all the evil thoughts depart, Refrain from taking, strive to give, Make life for others rich to live, We really think such life, such trait, Would lift the latch to Heaven's gate.
