Blood Transfusions Raise High Altitude Ceiling

An extra pint of blood makes the difference in man's struggle to withstand critical altitudes, new experiments at Duke university have revealed. Dr. Frank G. Hall, Duke physiologist and pioneer high-altitude experimenter, disclosed his findings at a recent UNESCO meeting at the world's top high-altitude specialists in Lima, Peru. The value of blood transfusions in our tolerance of high-altitude was proved this way at Duke: Five student subjects were given a pint of blood, then tested in a special low-pressure chamber to see how "high" they could go. The result: All could tolerate about 2,000 feet more altitude because of the extra oxygen they got from the blood.

Loss of blood worked the opposite way. Four students who gave blood were tested; they lost up to 2,000 feet of altitude because of the loss of oxygen reserve they had given away in their blood. Duke researchers measured tolerance by a special yardstick, "the interval of useful consciousness." As long as subjects were alert and mentally keen enough to do simple tasks and pass certain tests, they were considered "usefully conscious." In other words they performed tasks comparable to some of the things a pilot must do at 35,000 feet.

Midway in the tests they switched from breathing pure oxygen to inhaling the air circulating inside the chamber; meanwhile a constant pressure, equal to that flters undergo at 35,000 feet, was maintained.

HUSKING PEGS STILL A BUSINESS

DES MOINES, Iowa—(API)—A Shenandoah firm still manufactures corn husking pegs, although the corn picker has largely replaced husking of corn by hand. About 40 such items as husking pegs and hooks are turned out by the Raitt Manufacturing Company, believed to be one of the few firms now making such equipment. A company spokesman said the firm has seen business in husking pegs hit a volume of $35,000 a year. It has shrunk in recent years to about $2,000 annually. The company also manufactures other items.
