Rubber Industry For hundreds of years the potential of raw rubber had been appreciated by science and industry. But nobody had been able to correct its tendency to become sticky in hot weather and brittle in cold. In 1839 Charles Goodyear, who had spent six years experimenting, accidentally spilled a concoction of rubber, sulphur and white lead on a hot stove. He peered off the blob and found the answer. He patented the vulcanizing process in 1844. Rapid development of the rubber industry followed. His invention was the basis of the rubber industry today.
