donation. Other people agreed, and the machinery was ready to roll.

Carl was in the Mountaineer office early Tuesday with the news and the remark that "I kept worrying all night how that poor old lady was sleeping."

Since there was no telephone within 12 miles of Mrs. Messer's home, word had to be sent by the mailman, V. M. Jenkins. She received the glad tidings at 2 p.m. Tuesday, and was "proud that an honest person found it."

Mr. Jenkins brought her into town Wednesday to be presented with her money. The store seemed aglow with smiles as the fat little black purse was handed over. Mrs. Messer was beaming; Mr. Mundy was grinning with happiness; the sales girls and customers in the store were crowding around with happy faces. Even the reporters from the Mountaineer could not look blue or bored. As summed up by Mrs. Messer: "It all goes to show you that there's honest people left in the world. I'm so proud."

After inviting Mr. Mundy to "drop in. I'll be proud to feed you. We're poor but there's always something on the table," Mrs. Messer headed for the bank to deposit her money. When last seen by this reporter, she was making slow progress due to the necessity of buttonholing everyone she knew to tell them of her good fortune.

Mrs. Messer is proud and happy. So should be Waynesville.

MORE ABOUT Brown

However, he said, he thought "an announcement by any candidate for office should be termed carefully and should not be made too early."

Redden, who is voluntarily retiring from Congress at the end of his current term, is the "patron saint" of both Queen and Brown, having brought the latter here as his chief of staff and having obtained for Queen his committee-post, but there the similarity between the two men ends.

Queen, who served on the staffs of the late Senator J. Melville Broughton and former Senator Frank P. Graham before moving to the House side, is an out-and-out extrovert who has been active in politics since his election to the House in 1934. Brown, on the other hand, is reserved, is considered more than Queen, and his activity did not begin until 1937.
