Her owner, D. N. Ray, 69, explains: "She's helped me make my living since 1912 and to raise my three children and put them through school. The least I can do is feed her as long as she lives."

PARENT PROBLEMS

Children Should Have Some Outdoor Home Jobs

By GARRY CLEVELAND MYERS, Ph.D.

IT'S amazing how many mothers with able-bodied children from eleven to fifteen mow the lawn regularly alone. Even more fathers of such children mow the lawn.

For either parent, it might be good reducing exercise. But this is rarely the reason they do it.

Usually, the parents do such jobs themselves because their children never have been educated to share in home responsibilities. They have not been trained in earlier years to do lesser, lighter jobs. Indeed, the average child does very few regular jobs about the home; and it's rather unusual to see a boy or girl mowing a lawn, cultivating the flowers and vegetables of the garden, raking leaves in autumn or shoveling snow in winter.

A Reasonable Share

A well-brought-up child does a reasonable share of the various jobs about the home. Where there are several children who are old enough, they take turns doing the more arduous, less attractive jobs. Often, such assignments and a work program are decided in a kind of family council. Even then, the parents see that each child shoulders his responsibility.

Many parents have been persuaded by the silly doctrine so widely disseminated by "experts" that children should not be made to do what they don't want to do, but that parents should find ways to make all jobs about the home so attractive that the children will choose readily to do them.

Parents' "Follies" Failing to make this work, most parents suppose they have not
