

so THIS IS NEW YORK

By North Callahan

The farmer had come a long way to see New York and now that he was here, he was taking it in fast. Already he had covered Times Square as thoroughly as he usually did his back 4-acre patch. It was early morning, so he caught the subway downtown, not realizing that this was the subterranean hazardous hour. Below ground, the job-going mob rocked and rolled him. At Wall Street, he finally emerged, never to be the same again. His shoes were scuffed, his overcoat ruffled, his tie awry, and under his crumpled hat, beads of sweat stood out on his honest brow. "Dadburned if I've ever seen anything like it since Jim Stevens' hogs broke through my fence and almost cloistered me," he was heard to mutter darkly. "And at least, they weren't ground hogs!"

They tell a story here about the Texan, the Californian and the New Yorker who were talking about the hereafter. The New Yorker gave as his opinion that when the Lord returns to this earth, it would be as a New Yorker; the Californian said surely He would be a Californian. The big Texan studied his companions for a moment, then said, "Why fellers, I don't see why the Lord would want to change."

Where I grew up, stables were used for horses. Not so in many instances here. Just off lower 5th Avenue is a little street named Washington Mews which was once inhabited by nags, not cats. The stables were father fancy, however, being the Manhattan residences of such horses as those of the celebrated Mrs. Astor. When the fine four-legged fellows were replaced by less pleasant but faster motor transportation, people fixed up the abandoned stables and moved in. So there they are now and some of them prominent. Grover Whalen lived there before he got affluent and moved uptown to Park Avenue. It is presumed that these folks eat ordinary human food, but it seemed to me on looking at the row of residences, that there is still a rich, lingering atmosphere of corn and hay about the place.

My neighbor, Harry Nims, a distinguished lawyer and national authority on trade marks, says that the country lawyer is perhaps the most useful citizen in the community, active in church, school board and lodge. Yet, Mr. Nims points out, trials are now so complicated, so dreary and so expensive in time and money that the public avoids them whenever possible. Most court officials owe their positions to politics, he adds, and the litigant with no political connections may have little chance in court. Mr.

CENTER PIGEON will open this new community center building on the Henson Cove road in the near future. The concrete block structure also will serve as a voting place to take the place of the old Spring Hill School, which was moved this year. (Mountaineer Photo).

Nims says lawyers resist any change in their methods—a situation, he feels which is shameful and should be remedied.

A man by the odd name of Ray Vir Den left the local scene permanently recently. His first job was as a printer's devil on a weekly newspaper in Wheeler, Indiana. He came to New York 40 years ago, smitten by the big city, sang in a choir, turned to Wall Street, then in the depression, changed to advertising, eventually became president of an agency and married an opera star. He was colorful, had a lot of imagination, and his bright candle went out at the age of 59.

Grace Di Biase is a happy girl, yet she paints vividly scenes of suffering. As I talked to her in the New York University Book Store, it seems to me that her artist's eyes saw far beyond the walls of the building, and viewed the bigger realities of life. From Portland, Maine, she has been here ten years studying painting and opera. Around the corner, I viewed her impressive exhibit of religious art, outstanding among which was a striking picture of a suffering peasant in a concentration camp, entitled "Blessed Are the Persecuted". Miss Di Biase knows beau-

Faculty Of UNC To Decide On 'Lesser Of Two Evils'

CHAPEL HILL — One of the pungent problems confronting the faculty at Chapel Hill is whether it is worse for a professor to breathe chemical fumes or whether he should meet in an assembly room where he can't smoke.

At a recent faculty meeting in Venable Hall, the chemistry building where the faculty has met for years, a professor suggested the meeting place be transferred to the brand spanking new School of Business Administration where the auditorium is modern and spotless.

Chancellor House said the suggestion will be gone over by a faculty committee.

In the mail: thanks to Mrs. Grantland Rice, Bobby Jones and Toots Shor for their nice comments on the recent tribute in this column to the late and beloved Grantland Rice . . . a remark from a reader that New York should be roped off as an international zone.

Library Notes

Margaret Johnston
County Librarian
DON'T MISS THESE!
Grandma rolled her own—Ted Peckham.

The author "tells of the adventures of his Irish immigrant grandma who handled all situations with dignity back around the turn of the century and after."

Seasoned with salt—Mary Army.
A minister's daughter writes about her growing up in Montclair, New Jersey. The setting of this autobiography is "Tongueslip," the rambling old house which became home not only to her father's family, his in-laws, and their in-laws, but to assorted boarders.

Superstitions? Here's why! — Julie Forsythe Batchelor.
Dividing their work into categories—Food, Sounds, Animals, Fairies, etc. the authors, list under each the why's and wherefore's behind the common sayings and practices we still associate with good and bad luck.

Have fun with your children—Frances Horwich.
Chapters, by Miss Frances of TV's Ding Dong School, deal with daily life, integrating the child as a family member, sharing play, preparing him for firsts—and there is a helpful list of books for children and parents to read together. For parents of pre-school youngsters, a practical approach with a motherly assurance.

Lights along the shore—Fulton Ousler.
A collection of inspirational stories, parables, essays, anecdotes, all expressing the late author's belief in the power of faith, love and courage. Many of the pieces have appeared in the "Reader's Digest" and other magazines.

Common sense and world affairs — Dorothy Fosdick.
The author "states and exemplifies a dozen maxims whose practice would lead towards a sounder relationship between the United States and the rest of the world. Her illustrations, taken from recent political developments show where nations have taken good and bad courses of action".

Memories—Ethel Barrymore.

more family, of perhaps America's greatest actress, and of the stage itself during the last fifty years."

Meet Mr. Eisenhower—A. Smith.
The story of what happened to General Eisenhower when he became a mister. It is not an analysis of his political beliefs or an appraisal of his conduct of government, but an attempt at a human picture of his way of life as President."

Jefferson Davis—Hudson Strode.
The author of this biography of the President of the Confederate States says, "I am hoping to reveal the truth about Jefferson Davis, 'the most misunderstood man in history' . . . I have endeavored to combine biography and history in an acceptable synthesis, using care not to let the man become submerged in the milieu in which he lived."
