Is the Vast British Empire Breaking Up

By WILLIAM C. UTLEY ING GEORGE Vs silver ju-biles, now at its height in England, has formed an in-nocent, if world-wide, insti-tution for propagandising the unity and extent of the British Empire. and extent of the British Empire. No one, certainly, questions its ex-tent. But there are those among the political economists of the day who at least suggest that the far-flung realm shows signs of break-ing apart, and when the real test comes, if it ever does, they may be right right, right, "Recent developments in South Africa have again made people akt whether the British Empire is breaking up," writes Fred Clarke, English educator and former rep-resentative of the Union of South Africa at Geneva, in Ourrent His-tory Magazine, "Without attempt-ing to answer that question, one can have no doubt as to the impor-tance of the status of the Union act, which received rowal assent on June which received royal assent on June 22, 1934. This new law has a bear-ing on the whole future of British Imperial unity."

The status act contains the first definite official reference of the crown to the union as "a sovereign Independent state." Its accompany-ing seal act gives the exclusive right of use of the Great Seal and Little Seal, heretofore held by the king, to the South African min-Isters.

For more than a quarter of a cen-tury South Africa, politically, has been torn bitterly between two po-litical factions as directly opposed as our New Dealers and rugged in-dividualists. They were led by General Smuts, right-hand man of General Botha in the Union government which arose a few years after the South African war, and General Hertzog, a minister in the Botha cabinet who was removed in 1912, two years after the cabinet was forme

General Smuts and his faction openly considered the Union a definite part of the empire, with British civilization and culture dominant. Hertzog sympathizers held out against the complete social, cultural and political domination of the Boer population by the British, and have always striven to make the Union a separate and independent nation.

The present status of the Union has been effected as a sort of political compromise between the two generals and their respective par-ties. The Union is undeniably independent now, with merely "allegiance to the crown" the string politically tying it to Great Britain. And the two parties have fused into

They Get Together.

General Hertzog's nationalist party, which was in power in 1931, preferred to keep South Africa on the gold standard, believing that England had stepped off only tempo rarily, and that maintaining the standard would help to stabilize a leading industry of South Africa, gold mining. Other interests suffered badly, and General Smuts' South African party accused the incumbents of pampering the polit Ical interests always prone to take the opposite line from the empire jeopardizing the interests of the Union in general thereby.

It was conceded that if General Smuts could force an election at that time, he would have more than The "chief executive" is defined as an even chance of winning, but that miliar. And there is the Dutch off-spring, Afrikanns. The New Deal for South Africa pacifies both factions by fostering both cultures, Education is admin-istered in both. Newspapers and magazines are published in both languages. Poetry, novels and tech-nical works have appeared in Af-rikanns, and now there is even a carefully made translation of the carefully made translation of the Bible in that language. That the status act, with its ad-mission of South Africa's virtually absolute independence, applies as well to all of the British Dominions, is implied in the fact that it includes in its preamble the Balfour declaration obtained by Gen-eral Herizog when he headed the Nationalist government in 1924. This calls the Dominions "autonomous communities within the Brit-ish Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate to one another in any respect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Further removing British polit-Ical dominance from the Domin-lons was the Statute of Westminster, which was passed by the British parliament in 1981. It closely allied the constitutional develop ment of the other Dominions of the Empire with that of the Union of South Africa. The Balfour declara-tion and the Statute of Westminster are masterpleces of phraseology which carried soothing balm to both South African factions. The Status act is the application of them to the South African constitution. Two important concessions are made to the Dominions in the Statute of Westminster. It gives the Dominion government power to amend, repeal or modify any British act which has been incorporated in the law of the Dominion. It further states that no British law may be applied to any Dominion unless that Dominion has requested the application and consented to It.

Really Independent. The status act itself declares that no British legislation shall be considered in effect in the Union of South Africa until It is re-enacted by the South African parliament. the king, who shall act upon the he could not do so without stirring advice of his South African min-

And there is the Dutch off-Afrikaans. New Deal for South Africa as he saw fit in case of a crisis, in order to keep the realm from fall-ing apart. General Smuts was able to convince his followers that for to convince his tonowers that for centuries no such prerogative, if there was one, had been exercised, and that the question was not one of law, but of politics. Of course, what the economists who cits the status act as evidence that the British Empire is disinteg-rating fall to show is that political power or legal power are not the real bands which hold the Empire together. Experience has taught us that in time of war nations do not act on the literal interpretation of the law. The ties that bind are more substantial. In the case of the British Imperial Dominions they are the advantages of free trade within the Empire and the protection of the British fleet. The Union of South Africa would be an easy mark indeed for an invading force were it not for the protection of the greatest fleet in the world. It is extremely doubtful that the Union would ever want to forsake such a protection.

With its constitutional status now more clearly defined than ever before, the Union of South Africa is ready itself to begin expanding. It would like to annex the adjacent protectorates of Bechuanaland Swaziland and Basutoland, which are now governed under the Dominions office in London. When the Union was formed in 1909, the constitution provided for the eventual inclusion of these territories.

General Hertzog.

The hot weather orings us to problem every woman of gen proportions must cope with—by keep cool and fresh looking an wilting days? Well—Looking goes a long way, and pattern with its loose, easy cape shows treated waisiline gives you a m cool outlook on life. And very buring too, are the smeath of tering, too, are the graceful for the cape that does wonders to ize proportions. The darts or bust and at the waistline e contrive to avoid a too-fitted contrive to avoid a too-fitted the strategical points. Pick a mery printed voile or other a Pattern 2319 is available u 16, 18, 20, 34, 35, 38, 40, 42, 46. Size 36 takes 3% yards a fabric. Illustrated step-by-ste-ing instructions included. Send EVETTERS CHATTS, d Ing instructions included. Send FIFTEEN CENTS (I coins or stamps (coins pre-for this pattern. Write philoly address and style number. EU TO STATE SIZE. Address orders to Sewing Pattern Department, 243 West enteenth street, New York,

The hot weather brings us

s smit MEATY PROBLEM Customer-What kind of meat have you today. Butcher-Mutton and ve Customer—Is your mutton deal Butcher—No, the mutton is sh The venison is deer. The Real Kick The Son-You're putting up an aw ful roar just because I contracted up the smoldering embers of racial conflict between Boers (or, rather, the present-day Afrikaanders) and Britons, an animosity that had been admirably subdued in the preceding decades by wise government

General Smute

To youth of South Africa really goes the credit for coalition. Young men of both parties know the sentimental and romantic racial dissen sions merely as historical traditions not as real loyalties and convictions It was they whose insistence that these differences be wiped out once and for all impressed the nation with the necessity for taking up the real business at hand—that of administration out comment of administering good government. As a result of the coalition, the status act, satisfactory in the main to both act, satisfactory in the main to both parties, was effected. Boars in Opposition. The Boer is South Africa has long opposed the out-and-out po-litical dominance of the Union by London, as proposed by the Briton, for fear of losing his identity. South Africa is a region of two sep-arate and powerful cultures and its people speak two innguages. There is, of course, the English with which we are more or issue for sters. That there be no mistake, the king is defined as the one determined by the laws of succession of the United Kingdom. In South Africa the king's representative is the governor-general. Neither he nor the king have any powers of veto or reservation of a ыц. The governor-general may, however, simply return a bill with his opinion for further consideration if he thinks it wise. The king does not retain the power to name the prime minister and to dissolve parliament.

The case of war would be the real test. For, with the clearly worded status act, the Union of South Africa can now decide for itself whether or not to remain neutral if the empire enters a war. Says Clarke:

"It might even secede altogether, though not apparently, by legal process. Some commentators in Eng-land as well as in South Africa feel lation as well as in South Africa rec-disturbed by these possibilities. But 'equal status' necessarily implies them, and legal barriers would be filmsy defenses against the strong political pressure when the time of these of the strong the strong barriers and the strong str crisis comes."

It will be remembered that when England entered the World war there was widespread dissension in South Africs, and even serious uprisings in some cases. Clarke goes

"Neutrality and secession are po-litical issues, to be determined in the light of all the facts when the the light of all the facts when the question arises. They are not to be determined in advance, as some of the die-hard lawyers seemed to de-mand, by any constitutional legisla-tion, especially legislation under such documents as the Balfour dec-limition and the Statistic of West laration and the Statute of West-

The Ties That Bind. The abolition of the prerogative power of the king aroused the an-guish of the pro-British faction in that in the time of mists per cent black, and they were left out of the original Union and kept under direct London protection because of the treatment they had received in previous years at the hands of the Boers.

When, last year, Prime Minister Hertzog announced to Great Britain that the Union of South Africa was ready to act immediately to in-clude the protectorates, his act drew an instant appeal from Chief Tehe-kedi Khama of Bechuaniand. Brit-ish administration of the protec-torates has not boon all that it might be, but natives and native sympathizers believe that it is bet-ter than the discrimination which might harm them at the hands of the Boers.

Native Chiefs Balk. Unionists claim that there are no selfish reasons for annexation, for the Union has plenty of land and plenty of economic difficulty without taking on that of the native areas. taking on that of the native areas. Basutoland is tremendously over-crowded and conditions among the blacks are deplorable. The Union would move the surplus population over to the vast expanses of Bechuanaland, where the popula-tion is scarce, and would give the blacks land and frigate it. The natives and their chiefs are afraid of this. The reason is that the Tatle Converse. Mathematical States afraid of this. The senson is that the Tatit Company, Ltd., owns about 1,325,000 acres in Bechuana-iand. They fear that the blacks might be exploited industrially here, that the grazing land which has been held out to them as a home land for the surplus Union blacks might be selzed by the sur-plus whites of the Union. With the constitutional differ-onces atraightened out between black and white in the Union, and with the rising of a new generation which does not feel so bitterly the inequality of the whites and the blacks, it is held that the govern-ment under Smith and Herizon means well by the instruct panded that I'm kickin' about.

The Sire-I don't care what you

A Ring in It Jean-Mabel says she likes tone of Percy's volce. Jane-Yes, she thinks there's a ring in it.

Safety First Fireman-Jump into the bli Man-No, you might drop it. Put it on the ground first.--Penrson's Weekly.

Get Going Bertram-What would you do if kissed you? Betty-Oh, grin and bear it.