COUNTRY-BRED MEN ARE NOT MORE LIKELY TO BECOME FAMOUS THAN CITY-BRED MEN

There is nothing to the popular idea that nearly all great men were born and brought up in the country. It is very true that many of them were, but an analysis of "Who's Who in America" discloses the fact that a higher percentage of people from towns of 8000 population or over eventually become famous. In proportion to their numbers, these city people become prominent figures in American life about three times as frequently as their country brethren. But perhaps it is better to live in the country without fame, than in the city with it!
