OPENING FRUIT

JARS EASY WHEN YOU KNOW HOW

So you can't get 'em open? Well maybe you thought that circular with the jars was advertising matter and threw it away without reading. Don't worry, we will tell you about opening jars and sealing them too, because chances are that part of the trouble with opening is due to failure to follow instructions for sealing. Surely you know about sterilizing everything, leaving plenty of head space, and having the rubbers wet. So we will skip that part.

There are two types of home canning jars, and all have a trade name lettered in the side. The ones with screw-thread necks are Masons. Those with glass lids held in place with wire balls are lightning type or Ideals.

Mason jars are used with one-piece zinc caps and rubber rings, or with two-piece metal vacuum seals, or with glass top seal caps. The glass top seal is sometimes called a three-piece cap because it is made up of glass lid, rubber ring and metal band.

When sealing a Mason jar with zinc cap, place a rubber flat on the sealing surface (you may call it shoulder or ledge), screw the zinc cap down tight, then turn it back about half an inch. This is done to prevent steam forcing the rubber out of place or causing the cap to bulge. The cap is screwed tight as soon as the jar is taken out of the canner.

Use Pliers to Open Jar
The easiest way to get the jar open is to use pliers to pull the rubber out. Small dime store pliers are best for this because friend husband won't be tempted to borrow them when he has to fix the fence. If you have no pliers, the next best way is to run the sharp point of a knife under (not over) the rubber, wiggle the knife sideways (not up and down), then unscrew the cap. If you can't manage this, turn the jar upside down in hot water for five minutes before unscrewing.

When sealing Mason jars with Glass Top Seal Caps, put the rubber flat around the rim on the under side (top side has the name on it) of the lid, then place the lid so the rubber lies flat between the top of the jar and the lid. Screw the metal band tight and then loosen by turning it back one-fourth turn. This band must be loose while the jars are in the canner. (Failure to keep this in mind has caused a lot of painful burns.) They are tightened after processing. The metal bands should be taken off the jars the next day after the canning is done. Yes, if the manufacturer's instructions are followed, the jars will stay sealed without the bands. When ready to open, run the sharp point of a knife between the top of the jar and the rubber. Move knife sideways as moving it up and down is likely to damage both jar and lid.

Opening Vacuum Seals
When using Mason jars with vacuum seals, place the lid white side down so that the sealing compound rests on top of the jar. Screw the metal band tight as it will go with ordinary hand pressure and leave it that way until the next day. Then take it off and leave it off. No, you don't tighten the band again after processing. Metal lids, especially those which are slightly rounded or domed, are flexible. The compound is softer than a jar rubber. The flexible lid and soft compound permit steam and air to seep out during processing. That's why the bands are tightened before processing and need not be tightened again.

When ready to open the jar, flip the lid off with a bottle opener, or punch a hole in it and pry it off. The hole is all right because vacuum seal lids should never be used a second time.

When using a lightning type or Ideal jar, put the rubber flat on the sealing surface. Keep the lip out of the way of the wire. Place the lid so that it rests on the rubber. Then pull or push the long wire up until it fits in the groove on top of the lid. Leave the short wire up while the jar is in the canner. Push it down against the side of the jar just as soon as you take the jar out of the canner.

When ready to open, push the lower ball up and the upper ball down, then pull the rubber out with pliers or run the sharp point of a knife under the rubber, but remember moving the knife up and down may chip the jar or lid.

PEAR TREE STILL BEARS AFTER 120 YEARS OF AGE

At the home of Mrs. Daisy Merritt, here in Kenansville, stands an old pear tree, and when we say old, we mean old. But the unusual part of the story is that the old pear tree still bears fruit. Mrs. Merritt stated that her mother, who died in 1822 at the age of 75, told her that she used to eat pears from this same tree when she was but a child. Mrs. Merritt brought to the Times office a couple of the pears from the tree as evidence and they're sure delicious. Thanks Mrs. Merritt.

Things were certainly made to stand the rigors of time in the old days, weren't they?
