I got to wondering about this Mind you, I'm not joining the ranks of "bad-times - are - just - around the - corner" pessimists. I have heard Senator Clyde R. Hoey say there is no need for another depression, and a Chicago economist tells us that 1947 will be our most

State College Answers Farm Questions

Q. How can higher yields of soybeans be secured?
 A. Lime the soil with dolomitic limestone in accordance with the requirements as shown by soil tests and fertilize with adequate amounts of phosphorus and potash; and plant a good stand of an adapted variety.
 Q. Is it safe to eat canned food that has frozen?
 A. Freezing alone won't hurt canned foods, but it is the after-effects that may cause trouble. If freezing causes can to swell or break the air-tight seal, then you can look for trouble, as bacteria will enter. If you find leakage in a jar, use the food immediately.
 Q. What can I do to kill mites on strawberries?
 A. Dinitro Dusts have been found effective in the control of mites, though some burning damage may be received through the use of this material. It is justified when a heavy outbreak occurs.

prosperous year. And though I take the optimist's view, still I got to wondering, and I decided the best way to get an angle on what might happen to an individual farmer would be to check up on the case history of a man who stuck out the last ordeal. What did he have to face? What lessons did he learn? How did he pull through?

These questions sent me over to the Piedmont. I figured this would be a good section to sample, so I pulled up at Danbury, county seat of Stokes County, where I sought the office of E. S. Stokes, county farm agent for the State College Extension Service.

In the very pit of the last depression when the gross income from American agriculture had slipped by seven billion dollars from the 1929 high, Stokes himself was a youthful farmer. Since that time he has graduated from State College and has given the past six years to county agent work in his namesake county.

In the rebellion and ferment that came in the wake of bathtub gin and miniature golf, W. S. Steele was fighting to save his Sandy Ridge farm against an appalling set of unfortunate circumstances. He recalled for us, in the middle of our visit with him, how bank failures cost him "a few thousand dollars", and how, in 1932, his barn burned—destroying all of Steele's wheat, hay, and workstock. Thru this trial, he had the courage to tell us:

"Yes, people talk about a depression, but it wasn't so bad!"

Other people—like midwest farmers who blocked highways with spiked poles and dumped mill in roadside ditches—seemed to think it was pretty tough.

But there were men like Steele who, as Kipling put it, "watched the things they gave their life to, broken, and stooped to build'em up with worn out tools."

With the "will to hold on" and "starting again at the beginning, Steele added borrowed money to $500 he collected as insurance on his barn, and began immediately to rebuild, buy workstock, feed and equipment.

Today, Steele's farm is a going concern, founded on the financial success that comes with careful farm planning. On his average-aged farm, he manages to plant corn, oats, wheat, and legumes, as well as his tobacco. His farm buildings, his home, and every member of the family is insured. If there is any secret to surviving a depression, I think it can be summed up in Steele's statement: "All through the depression, and every year since, I have always managed to save a little money."
