In England, Scotland and America the Border Collie, which has been bred for herd work for 300 years, is the most frequently used sheep dog. The Border Collie is known for intelligence, obedience, and working ability. Standing about 18 inches at the shoulder, this dog has a dense coat of black with white markings on the collar, feet and tail tip. Weights run from thirty to forty pounds. The Border Collie's head is shorter and wider, and his eyes larger, than those of his big cousin, the Scotch Collie.

Puppies that come from working stock frequently display an interest in sheep as early as seven or eight weeks of age. The first lesson is usually taught at three to four months, when the puppy is taught to lie down on signal and to walk at heel on command. Training is simplified if the young dog can be all wed to follow the example of a well-schooled older dog, but many fine sheep dogs have been trained without ever having seen another dog work. The education of a sheep dog requires both time and patience, but once his dog is trained, the farmer or herdsman will wonder how he ever managed without his four-footed helper. Those interested in obtaining instructions for the training of a sheep dog may have them free of charge by writing to the Gaines Dog Research Center, 250 Park Avenue, New York 17, N. Y.

Trials for sheep dogs are held at annual contests in New England and California. Working at distances of hundreds of yards, and guided by signals from their owners given by means of outstretched arm or gesture with a cane, the dogs demonstrate their ability by herding a group of sheep through a complicated course and finally into a small pen. Large galleries of spectators who attend the trials are invariably impressed with the skill and sagacity exhibited by the canine contestants as they go through the maneuvers of handling a flock.

U. S. DOG POPULATION IS NEAR 20,000,000

America's dog population is right around 20,000,000, a survey by the Gaines Dog Research Center, New York City, indicates.

The South leads in the number of dog-owning families and the average dogs per family is also highest there, the survey also revealed.

Dog ownership varies in inverse proportion to the size of communities, with farmers having the highest percentage of dog ownership.

Approximately half of all families with children boast dogs, while 40 per cent of families without children keep canine pets.
