AT HOME ON THE FARM WITH THE CITY COUSIN

All this talk about providing starving rats with more than 200 million bushels of grain this coming year, set me to thinkin' about "The Case of the Farmer Whose Poultry Industry Was Wiped Out By Rats."

Ed Buffalo, a Negro farmer, of the Gumberry Community, Northampton County, built a brooder house early last Spring. With no hint of disaster, he purchased 160 baby chicks and placed them in the building.

"Four days later," the would-be poultryman relates, "all the chicks were doing fine except 15 weak ones that I considered a normal loss."

"And then what happened?" I asked.

"Well," says Ed, "on the fifth morning I went to the brooder house to stir the fire -- and there wasn't a chick to be found."

Ed went on, "At first we thought it was thieves, but late that afternoon, while I was talkin' to a friend I heard a very weak cheerp, cheerp, coming from under the floor. We looked, and found, --- "Yes? What did you find ---" say I.
"One hundred and five dead chicks."
Then he went on to tell how rats had carried the chicks through a small hole in the concrete floor.
Ed poured some hot lye water down the rat run. The result, one large rat, very much in a hurry.
If this was the only rat involved he was responsible for more than 100 chicks.
