It Is Time To Eradicate Rats

Practically every farmer harbors at least a few rats says I. O. Schaub of the State College Extension Service, and he points out that rats with plenty to eat are hard to trap or poison.

Thousands of bushels of grain destroyed by rats each year is not the only damage these pests cause. They are carriers of Bubonic plague, typhus, and other deadly diseases.

Rats never take vacations. They may raise 6 or more litters per year with from 6 to 22 in each litter. Ignoring the death rate, the offspring from one pair of rats could exceed 350,000,000 in 3 years.

The population can be quickly reduced, however, by using improved modern control methods, and now is the time to do it.

Rats cannot be eliminated if they have places to hide. Piles of rubbish, stacks of lumber or other material, and wooden floors close to the ground are favorite hiding places for rats. Many farms have several such hiding places close to granaries or other food supplies. Such a combination is a perfect "rat hotel".

Do not let your farm become a "rat hotel". Remove rat shelters, especially those near buildings. Pile lumber and other material on racks a foot above the ground. Replace wooden feeding floors with concrete, wherever possible. Otherwise, raise them a foot or more above the ground, or prevent rats' burrowing under them by surrounding them with an underground barrier of concrete, sheet metal or hardware cloth.

Director Schaub urges every North Carolina resident to join in the state-wide rat control campaign which is scheduled to be held the first week in December. In cooperation with the Predator and Rodent Control Division of the U. S. Department of Interior Fish and Wildlife Service, the Extension Service will sponsor the program in the rural areas, while the State Board of Health supervises the work in urban centers.

Congress in Action

Spectators at a recent Congressional inquiry guffawed. I hope that some of them got the point. A movie actor had just remarked, dead-pan: "I've heard people say that we would have a more efficient government without Congress." A very serious point was contained in that statement, which apparently struck spectators as a humorous jibe at lawmakers, present and not present.

It is somewhat of an American custom to poke fun at our elected officials. Some steam is released that way, like the blowing off of a safety valve. That's all right. But that any sane American should suggest doing away with Congress is no laughing matter. You might as well say that we ought to give up our democratic way of life, in the interest of greater efficiency. One would be equivalent to the other. But who wants an efficient tyranny?

Our Safeguard
I am going to say that I appreciate Congress. I am not ashamed to say it. Moreover, I am concerned that there are those who fail to recognize the essential dignity and worth of this branch of our government. Out of the welter of political turmoil in Washington, I think there is still room for a healthy respect for what our Congress does. And we must never forget that Congress represents the will of the people, of the majority. Congress is a mighty safeguard.

When any Congressional session is over, try looking back over the record. It will usually surprise you how much was accomplished. Especially so, if you are one of those Americans who like to chant: "Why, oh why, doesn't Congress do something?"

Accomplished Much
When the recent Congress adjourned in late July, final action had been taken on at least 17 major issues. This was an array of achievements, when you recall that this Congress was the first new Congress following the war.

Action was taken on presidential tenure and succession, labor management relations, postal-to-portals pay, estate and social security taxes, National Science Foundation, continuation of the R.F.C. and the C.C.C., crop insurance, continuation of certain subsidies, Army-Navy unification, cashing of terminal leave bonds, executive reorganization, continuation of first class postal rates, rent control, and termination of existing credit regulations.

A Thankless Task
This Congress was also economy-minded. It should be credited with saving between $2 and $3 billion for taxpayers, despite widespread "scare" tactics of a powerful and well-mobilized bureaucracy. Considering the fact that the American people already spend more for government—local, state, and national—than they spend for food, we should be grateful to an economy-minded Congress.

Fateful problems will face this same Congress in its special session and the regular session to follow. Our sincere commendation should go to legislators for their efforts, and for their sincere public service. Their thankless but necessary persistence will remain necessary as long as we wish to maintain this Republic.
