Homespun Industry Largest In World Now 50 Years Old

A half-million customers can't be wrong, and that's why Biltmore Industries in Asheville for nearly 50 years has turned a lackadaisical eye toward all modern machinery used in weaving wool into cloth. The largest hand-weaving establishment in the world, Biltmore insists on making its fine woolen cloth one strand at a time, because the operators believe the more time put into the processing, the more time the cloth will wear on your back. An average weaver produces about 20 yards a day.

The plant employs around 100 workers and Mr. Fred Seely, young war veteran who has recently taken over the business since his father, says he has to be careful not to startle those half-million customers with any brash manufacturing notions. The Industries were founded in 1901 by Mrs. George Vanderbilt and in 1917 they were taken over by Fred Seely, a chemist. He designed the four Industries buildings - four sturdy stone structures on the hill above Asheville. Originally the Industries included many types of handlooms but gradually the fabrication of woollen cloth predominated. Reports from ginners and cotton growers as of December 1 indicate a 440,000 bale crop for North Carolina this year. This is the same as 1946 but is 28 per cent smaller than the 10-year average. Yield of lint cotton is indicated at 341 lbs. per acre for 1947; 29 pounds smaller than the yield harvested in 1946.
