Wherein Ricardo Pays a Visit to America

By Ricardo de la Cruz
(Mr. de la Cruz, 28-year-old head of public relations and fund raising for the Philippine National Red Cross, served with an American infantry division in helping drive the Japanese from the Philippines. He is seeing this country for the first time as an American Red Cross study visitor.)

good reason for laughing. I noticed this among the American troops fighting in the Philippines. Americans are friendly. They are lavish with their smiles and with such warm greetings as "How are you this morning?" "How are you today?" "Did you have a good sleep?" The addition of "this morning" or "today" to the usually trite "How are you?" personalizes the greeting, gives the feeling that the inquirer is really interested in your welfare.

R de la Cruz

The average foreigner, who knows America principally through American movies, newspapers and magazines, is refreshingly bewildered and pleasantly confused when after crossing the ocean he finds himself in a normal land inhabited by normal people leading normal lives. Cowboys, Indians, and gangsters do not roam the country. Not every family is on the verge of divorce. And millions of Americans have apparently never seen the inside of a plush nightclub.

I find Americans to be the best natured people I've ever known. They seem equipped with an inexhaustible fund of wit and humor. The American is famously fond of laughter, and the typical American speech before an audience seems to begin with, "I am reminded, at this time, of a little story." In fact, even when the odds are against him, the American finds a

As for the country itself, it is full of marvels to the foreigner. The amazing network of transportation which links all parts of the country from the humblest rural village to the huge metropolis. The almost unbelievable system of communication which makes it possible for a person in San Francisco to speak to someone in Washington, D. C. in a matter of minutes after the clock is placed. The incredible abundance which characterizes most American cities. These all contribute to the undeniable fact that America is a great and wonderful country.
