CLEVELAND, OHIO—Many car owners put antifreeze in the radiator, lighter grease in the transmission, thinner oil in the crankcase and think their car is winterized. Not so, say the technical and service experts of Willard Battery. The equally vital electrical system, often overlooked, needs winterizing, also.

Motorists should take these six steps in preparing the electrical system for cold weather, the Willard experts advise: Test battery and recharge if necessary, clean battery terminals, tighten battery hold-downs, check voltage regulator, tighten all electrical connections and adjust generator belt. Unless a battery is fully charged, it will face an almost insurmountable task when required to start an engine in zero weather. At zero a fully charged battery has only 49 per cent of the cranking power it has at 80 degrees.

A battery can be ruined by freezing in cold weather unless it is kept fully charged. No liquid other than pure water should ever be added to the battery.
