

General Crop Conditions

During the latter half of August, conditions in North Carolina continued generally unfavorable for truck crops. In the mountain areas, wet soil conditions and rainy weather are still damaging late summer cabbage and snap beans. In the Northeastern section of the State, wet conditions have delayed planting of the early fall snap bean crop and have caused considerable irregularity in stands of late fall cabbage.

In the United States, prospects for fall crops of commercial vegetables are generally favorable. Damage to Florida vegetables from the hurricane of August 26 was confined mainly to fall tomatoes, a few early plantings of cucumbers and squash, and to seed beds of celery, tomatoes, peppers, and eggplant.

Recent rains in the North Atlantic States have brightened prospects for fall crops but were too late to cause much improvement in summer vegetables. Most fall crops in this area have now been planted and are making good growth.
