SPORTS AFIELD

By: TED KESTING

Sweetest upland game bird for many is the common bob-white. In New England they call him the quail, and down south he is a partidge, which is a little closer to the facts but naturalists think we should accept the bird's own name for himself: Bob-White. Some scientists believe no other creature save man has so vast a vocabulary; that is, a meaningful vocabulary. I exclude the imitative powers of catbirds, parrots and mynas, and the gobbledgook of crows. Students of the bobwhite list such phrases as the following: the food call given by the cock bird when bringing home the bacon; the screaming battle cry of the cock when another male takes too much interest in his mate; the flicker-like cackle of the male in pursuit of his love affairs; the note of the hen that invites the male; and a great deal of baby talk.

That is to say, the various notes of the chicks—the metallic piping of the lost chick, the childish chatter of youngsters keeping in touch with each other while feeding in the grass, and the curlew-like wall of the captured chick, a sound that brings down upon your head a demon in feathers—the parent bird.

All this is but a fraction of the bobwhite's language, yet the sweetest note is that liquid far-ranging ka-lo-ee-hee that sounds like some Polynesian song of welcome. Ornithologists call it the scatter call, meaning that it calls the scattered flock together.

Sometimes you might be lucky enough to hear the "whisper call" given when danger is near but not so close as to dictate retreat. It's like the cheery bob-bob-white, but so soft it carries only a few yards.

When danger is real you'll hear the old birds rapping out that mechanical message in code to-lick-kick-kick over and over. Chicks are absolutely responsive to this for it means that peril is right at hand. The birds, too, are right at hand—that's the baffling part of this kind of all ground birds. You hear them all about you, the alarm cry spattering like hail on a tin roof, but not a feather can you see.

General Farm Crop Situation

A second week of generally fair autumn weather was experienced by farmers in North Carolina thru

October 14. Land preparation for planting of small grains and winter cover crops is considered to be on schedule and condition of fall maturing crops for harvest showed marked improvement, corn, cotton, peanuts and sweet potatoes receiving foremost attention. Grading and marketing of tobacco is practically completed in this section.

Heating Equipment Should Be Checked

With cold weather approaching, farmers were advised today by L. F. Weeks, Duplin County Agent to check their heating equipment and condition it for safe winter service. Fire strikes with out warning, he pointed out, and destroys about $90,000,000 worth of farm property annually -- or about 4 farm buildings every hour.

Mr. Weeks suggests a systematic check-up before a fire or injury. Check the chimney to see that all joints are tight and that there is a spark arrester to protect combustible roofs. See that all stove pipes are in good condition and a safe distance from walls, ceilings, curtains, or paper. Use a metal floor cover under wood or coal-burning stoves. Use metal containers for ashes.

Don't gamble with leaky connections, defective equipment, or poor adjustments on kerosene stoves or other oil burning equipment.
