Don't Budget God Out!

By MRS. H. JOYNER

This is the story of a young couple, both nice and fine, who started off their happy marriage with a budget that soon warped their sense of values.

Even before their marriage, they had worked out a very strict budget that they fully intended to adhere regardless of what came up, so as to soon have enough saved to enable them to build their house of Dreams. His salary was above the average for a young man and as they planned to live on less than one half of what he made, they would in no time have enough to start building. They started house keeping in a drab and shabbily furnished flat but being young and in love they laughed at the inconvenience. The main thing was to bank as much money as possible out of each pay check.

At first each had enough pride to be embarrassed when asked for donations for worthy causes when they had to refuse because a donation would cut into their budget. But after a few months and their bank balance grew, they became hardened to everything but saving money.

During this time of hard saving, the young man's father became ill, and was in sore need of medical attention, and when his mother timidly asked if he would make them a loan, he put her off firmly. His father's health would have to wait, for their beloved budget did not allow for loans, regardless of whom it was for, or why. A short time later, his mother called to tell him that his father had passed on. If their conscience bothered them at this time, all they had to do to revive their good spirits was to look at their nice balance in their bank book. Why, another few months of close budgeting and they could start building.

Soon after his father's death, he sent his widowed mother to live with one of her daughters. He thought one of asking her to stay with him but he would be forced to buy another bed, and too, the food bill would be higher. His budget simply must not be changed.

At about this time he noticed a decided change in the attitude of the boss and co-workers. They no longer joked with him as before, and conspicuously shunned him on several occasions. They no longer seemed to regard him as a friend. Their changed attitude, as near as he could figure it, had begun on the occasion that the boss had passed the hat around after asking each to donate a sizeable sum that was to be given to one of the loyal workers who had recently been stricken with an incurable malady. As the hat was passed, even the janitor, whose pay was small, put in $5.00 and lamented that he wished he could spare more. As the hat came his way, he, with his mind on the budget, put in a measly quarter, and he was sure that all looked at him as if they were seeing him for the first time. After this incident, things changed very rapidly. In no time he was notified that his services were no longer needed.

So he, with a heavy heart, departed for home. Never had, it seemed so drab and cheerless, and instead of finding a cheerful wife to greet him, he found her crying her heart out. To his utter amazement, she proceeded to tell him that she could stand her unhappiness no longer and that it was his fault that she had lost all of her friends. She raved on that all of her girl friends had forsaken her because of their stinginess in adhering to that "awful budget". As she continued to cry and rave on, he quietly went and got the budget that once seemed so very, very important to them both, and tearing it to pieces, he laughed his old happy laugh again, something he had not done in months. It was so contagious that she soon joined in. Taking her gently in his arms, he said, "Honey, this thing has been our downfall for it has made us selfish, hard and unfeeling."

A budget is alright if it is made right, but we made ours all wrong, for you see dear, we left God completely out. Our next one will be very, very different.
