Glass Walls For A New Mode Of Living

NEW CANAAN, CONN.—Here's a house designed to bring the outdoors indoors. It sits on the edge of a grassy plateau overlooking the gently rolling hills of Connecticut and was designed by Philip G. Johnson, Director, Dept. of Architecture, Museum of Modern Art. The four walls are polished Pittsburgh plate glass supported by thin steel beams, the floor is polished brick, it has an automatic ceiling and is warmed by radiant heating. As you're used to thinking of it, this house is not a complete dwelling, just a single unit of an entire living space. Other units are a large lawn or "floor", a contrasting brick guest house and a display of sculpture outside. The entire tree-bordered grass-covered piece of ground binds them together. Also, it's not a house in the conventional manner, but rather a single large room. Except for the bathroom it has no inner partitions. The bathroom and fireplace are back-to-back in a large flow-marking brick cylinder. Furniture is positioned to create the illusion of different rooms. For privacy, and to have the sun just as it should be seen, the sun is kept out of the house.
