

Parents Cooperation Needed

Mrs. Wm. E. Teachey
Parents can help their child get a good start in learning by helping him live a rich, full, and satisfying life. Rich and varied experiences are necessary to child development. It is worthwhile for a child to have many opportunities to be with children of his own age. Knowing how to live happily with other boys and girls helps children in making adjustments to their school environment. This contact with other children makes a child feel at ease and releases his energies for his school work.

Every child is entitled to physical health, and he will have a hard time remaining happily adjusted without it. The inattentive child does not learn and the sick child is very likely to be inattentive. Defects of the eyes or ears, under-nourishment, and chronic physical deficiencies have a lot to do with a child's progress in school and it behooves parents to see that corrective treatment be given before school begins.

In school we strive to make each child have a feeling of security, a sense of belonging, and a feeling of success. The child who is emotionally safe and secure at home will be relaxed and happy as he meets the many new experiences at school. As parents you can make your child have a feeling of emotional security in the home by making him know that he is loved and wanted.

school and teachers. Schools do not exist for the purpose of giving employment to teachers but for the purpose of giving to your child social, emotional, and intellectual growth. The teachers will appreciate your interest in trying to understand what they are endeavoring to do for your child. When parents cooperate with the school for the child's best interests, the child has a better chance to be serene, happy, and successful in his school work.
Regular school attendance as a requisite to good learning is well known. Every teacher knows that adequate instruction cannot be given to a pupil who attends classes irregularly. Most parents realize this too. Absence from school causes the child to lose interest and works a hardship on him as well as on his teacher. The chief cause of non-promotion has been said to be irregular school attendance. It is the duty of parents, interested in the school success of their child, to see to it that all absences are strictly unavoidable.
Give ear to what your child has to say, respect his ideas, and help him to express them. Show a genuine interest in his work and do not be stingy with praise. Read to him from books suitable to his age level.
