Heating Plant Fire Hazards Menace Home

Fire hazards resulting from unsafe installation and operation of heating plants are major causes of home fires. These hazards cause more than 100,000 fires a year, according to the National Fire Protection Association.

One of the chief dangers is that soot, which frequently accumulates in chimneys and smoke pipes, will be ignited. This makes an exceptionally hot fire, from which chimney sparks can scatter profusely.

Regular cleaning of chimneys is recommended as a safeguard. Proper chimney construction also is essential. A house should be built so that no wood or other combustible material touches the chimney.

Because roofs are directly exposed to chimney sparks, asphalt shingles and other fire-resistant roofings are high on the list of protective building materials. Fire protection engineers point out that fire-resistant roofing also lessens the danger of sparks from brush fires and similar outdoor blazes.

Furnace smoke pipes leading to chimneys must have adequate clearance from ceilings and walls. Smoke pipe sections should be fitted together with metal screws to withstand possible "puffbacks."

Although the primary purpose of automatic temperature controls for heating equipment is to maintain a constant degree of heat indoors, controls of this kind also serve as effective protection against excessively high temperatures which might result from uncontrolled combustion during severe cold weather.

TOBACCOLAND NORTH CAROLINA

THE PHANTOM RIDER

It was Aunt Martha who first told the story about the Phantom Rider of Buckhorn Hill in Wilson County.

Between whiffs of snuff Aunt Martha, who has already lived a goodly number of years beyond her three-score and ten allotment, insisted it was all so.

She commented first that it all happened a long while before Wilson became the world's largest weight least tobacco market and definitely before anyone had any idea that in 1950 tobacco would be averaging almost 60 cents a pound on the mart.

"People would have thought you wazy crazy then if you had predicted such a thing" commented Aunt Martha in an aside to her regular story.

Be all this as it may, they do say that when the wind is high and the boughs of the trees in the meadows moan in chorus with the bullfrogs in the marshes and the crickets in the crevices of the woodlands, you can still hear the clomp-clomp of the haunted horseman on his steed pounding up Buckhorn Hill.

Aunt Martha was certain of one thing, she said. No one had really ever seen him. But many in the years since he lived on this earth had heard him and his horse.

So the story goes there was a young hired hand living near the Buckhorn Hill who became madly in love with a young lady of some means nearby. This young lady, Martha by name, had parents who set great store for her future. They cared not at all for the idea of the penniless youth who came courting her. They bade her stay away from him and warned him to quit seeing their beautiful daughter. It was, you see, an old old tale. Poor boy and rich girl.

Finally the tale took the ordinary and usual turn. The two young people decided to run away and get married and try to live happily

He came for her under her window at her home with his noose bag. She jumped out of the window into his waiting arms. And they set off.

But Martha's father had heard the noise as she came out of the window. He went to her room found it vacant and the window open, and quickly set out in not pursuit.

On horseback himself he quickly came to within hearing distance of the horse of Martha and near again and took a short cut ahead of them. A rifle nestled across the pommel of his saddle.

He swiftly turned toward the road, stopped in a clump of thickets along the way and waited. He waited on the brow of Buckhorn Hill.

It wasn't long before the two lovers came along at a rapid rate. The moon was high and the wind moaned through the trees just like on the nights you can hear the hoof beats now.

The father saw the approaching steed and as it came abreast of him he took aim at the figure clothed in boy's clothes on the horse and fired. The "boy" fell off at once. The horse and the "girl" sped on—the horse scared by the shot.

The father went out into the road bent on finishing off the boy, and golden tresses of March fanned out over the road where her head was and where a cap lay. She was dead when her father reached her.

It wasn't until later that the young man whom Martha loved pulled his horse in and turned and rode back at a rapid pace bent on avenging her death. As he rode over the brow of Buckhorn Hill his horse fell. Maybe it was a stone. Maybe a hole in the road. But the young man was thrown off—he died with a broken neck almost instantly.

Aunt Martha stopped.

"And ever since that day," she said, "ever since then, that young man and his horse have been haunting the place."
