BIG JIM AND THE FILMFLAMMERS

Old Doctor Devil and Doctor Buzzard and the rest of the filmflammers are on the loose again. How they've kept it up so long is a mystery, but ever since the first pile of tobacco was sold on the world's largest bright leaf tobacco market back in 1880 for 50 cents a pound they've managed to eke out a precarious living among the farmers, white and colored, in Eastern Carolina.
Albert Privett, chief of police in Wilson, was talking about it the other day. But he didn't have to mention Dr. Devil and Dr. Buzzard. They were an old story. They were both conjur doctors extraordinary and, though they operated twelve months a year, they always managed to expand their operations temporarily during the tobacco season. Ditto the filmflammers who abound in the area during the time the golden harvest pours money into the coffers of the Tar Heel farmers.
Both Dr. Devil and Dr. Buzzard, so the story goes, are really South Carolina products. But ask any North Carolina Negro about them and you'll get a grin — nothing more. Sho' they know who they are. But that's all you'll get.
Dr. Devil and Dr. Buzzard came up to Wilson one day bent on making a little ready cash and ran into Big Jim. Now Big Jim was a Negro reputed to be fairly well off. As a matter of fact he was stone broke like many of us. But Doc Buzzard and Doc Devil, they decided that the time was ripe for easy pickin's. It was just at tobacco market season and they had heard that Big Jim had sold his 'bacco and had been paid well for it. They also knew that Big Jim was superstitious in a big way.
Now Big Jim carried a Jo-Mo in his pocket.
What? You've never heard what a Jo-Mo is? Well you can find plenty of Jo-Mos in pockets in Eastern Carolina. They are little home-made bags — some leather, some cotton, some even silk. They're filled with the right hand back leg of a frog, a little snake skin, some secret kind of roots
