AUNT MARTHA PHILOSOPHIZES

Aunt Martha came to visit us one night and sat down in the front parlor to regale us with some tales about various things in Eastern North Carolina.

One was about how to keep a hen from settin' on her eggs in a nest. Another was about how to find water under the ground, while a third was about her favorite, the jo-mo.

Aunt Martha lived in Wilson, and she was even more interested in the fact that tobacco was selling so well there. She had a farm, you see, and it was off of this farm that she gathered these stories.

"You know," said Aunt Martha "it's a sin and a shame what some people believe. Most of 'em believe anything you tell them. They don't seem to recognize the truth. Either that, or they believe everyone's truthful. Either way they seem to be plumb crazy.

"Take this yarn about the settin' hen. Why goodness sakes. Everyone knows that you can't do away with the mother instinct. And everyone knows that when once a hen gets it into her mind she is going to hatch some baby chicks, she's going to do it no matter what anyone says. But they tell out on my farm—and believe it too—that all you have to do to a settin' hen to stop her from settin' (though lord knows why anyone would want to stop her) is to throw a bucket of water on her. Seems to cool her disposition from settin', the story is. They say a hen settin' has a temperature of around 104. The water cools her off. Cools her off indeed."

Aunt Martha was very dubious about all these stories. Even we didn't believe the yarn about the man with a wooden leg who started taking Hadacol. One morning he came down stairs and said he was tired. It was all caused by the stuff he was taking. He'd taken so much of it that he had got'en tired chopin' the sprouts off his wooden leg.

But it was about the Jo-Mo that Aunt Martha always talked the most. A lot of Negroes, it seemed, carried them around. Either in their pockets or in a little leather or flannel bag about their necks. Inside the bags were such delicacies as the left hind leg of a toad, a sasparilla root, a piece of snake skin, etc.

"Now do you know," Aunt Martha said, "that these people really believe that such stuff will keep evil spirits away, or that the jo-mo will guard the water from coming to harm."

And finally that night she regaled the crowd with her comments about the forked stick from a peach tree sprout.

"All you have to do," Aunt commented with a snift, to let everyone know how the left about the whole thing, "is to get such a forked peach stick and hold it out in front of you with your bare hands, and if there's water within fifty yards or ten to twenty feet deep in the earth, the stick will start turning in your hands and point to the spot. And people use that idea too."

Poor Aunt Martha. She misses a great deal of the joy and romance of life.
