GARDEN TIME

Many vegetables are still growing in the gardens of the state and for that reason we don't begin to think of cover crops until too late for some of the better ones. There is no good reason at all why cover crops should not be planted among garden crops at the last cultivation which is right at hand in some parts of the state.

Three of the more commonly used cover crops are rye, Italian rye grass and crimson clover. My personal objection to rye and rye grass are that in small gardens they are very difficult to turn under so that they will not come up again and require killing with a hoe. However, they do have the advantage of making good early growth in the spring.

My choice is crimson clover because of its ease of handling and because it is a legume. One objection to it is that it doesn't make heavy growth in spring as early as rye. However, the part of the garden to be used for early crops could be plowed after the clover is large. Crimson clover should be planted in early September and will require about 20 pounds of seed per acre. If you have not grown clover before you may have to inoculate at planting time. The large seed stores sell clover inoculants. If your soil is very acid an application of lime would help too.

As I have intimated earlier in this column, I grow dahlias as a hobby. Even with such a large growing crop I make a practice of sowing crimson clover among the dahlia plants about the first or second week in September each year. I have been pleased with the results and I'm sure you will be also if you use it as an annual winter cover crop.

Drying corn on the farm with forced air ventilation offers mid-western farmers a better way to handle a least a part of their crop. Each fall, according to research of the U. S. Department of Agriculture and a number of state experi-
