Many growers in other sections, Ballentine and Hilton asserted, are planning to put at least half their crop under CCC loans. The officials advised Tar Heel growers to to consider following this plan on their own farms. They particularly urged that lower grades of cotton be placed under loan, since producers stand to lose more on these grades than on better quality lint. This Loan Program

This year's huge lint crop may result in glutted markets and further declines in prices unless Tar Heel growrs join others throughout the nation in taking advantage of the CCC price - support loan program. gram.
This is the opinion of L. Y. Ballentine, State Agriculture Commissioner, and James H. Hilton, dean of the State College School of Ag-of the State College School of Agriculture.

In a joint statement, Ballentine and Hilton said the nation's cotton growers have responded so wholeheatedly to the plea for incrased production that thy have overshot their goal of 16 million bales.

"Cotton prices," they added, "have dropped about 10 cents a pound from what they were earlier in the year and now are below parity in some instances. Such prices fail to reflect the increased costs of production - higher prices for fertilizer and insecticides and increased wgaes for hoe hands and pickers."
