Plant Disease Clinic Does Heavy Business

State College's plant disease clinic, formally organized this summer for the first time, has been doing a rushing business.

Farmers of the State, plagued by crop diseases, have been sending in plant specimens at the rate of about 50 to 100 per week. Most of these have been tobacco which has been hit hard by black shank and a number of other ailments.

J. H. Jenson, who heads up the college's plant disease work, says that by the end of the season, something like 1,500 letters covering disease diagnosis will have been written.

Although free diagnostic and consultation service has been available on an informal basis for many years, the plant disease clinic was operated on a formal basis this summer for the first time.

Under the new plan, 16 staff members take turns at conducting the clinic for a week at a time. Their Nearly half of all the eggs produced in the world are laid by U. S. hens. For the last six years, the average American has been eating eggs at the rate of more than one a day.

Field tests in 1950 indicated that the better lines of burley tobacco with resistance to wildfire were comparable to the best standard commercial varieties in yield, quality, and returns per acre.
