CHATS

Red Mites
A high number of culls and a notable drop in profits may often be traced to the age-old poultry parasites of lice and mites. These external parasites are a constant threat to the well-being of most flocks and represent one of the most serious problems in poultry production.

and in other places in the poultry house, this parasite comes out at night to attack the birds while they roost. After filling itself with the blood from the fowl, the red mite usually returns to its hiding place before the bird leaves its perch.

Destroying Red Mites
In combating red mites, first remove the roosts so they can be treated or sprayed. If perch poles are not detachable, they should be made detachable. All dried manure should also be removed. Next, sweep down the inner walls of the poultry house and remove all litter from the nests, floor, and away from the area of the house.

The entire house should be treated when there is widespread infestation. On the other hand, when mites are found only in the nests and vicinity of the roosts, treating these areas may be all that is necessary.

Lice also must be contended with in the poultry house. Lice may remain on fowl continuously and may go undiscovered for some time if birds are not inspected regularly. In this case, a bird may become unthrifty and rundown before a raiser realizes what has happened.

The common species affecting fowls are the large and small body-lice, head-lice, and de-plumping louse.

Roost Treatment
Roost applications are effective in the control of lice. The roost treat-

Bring the 'GERMEX'
Yes, it's chick time again. Time to clean up and disinfect the brooder house. Gotta give those chicks a clean home. Gotta protect 'em against harmful diseases. So bring on the GERMEX! Can't do the job right without Dr. Salsbury's Germex! We'd better get started now with GERMEX! When you need poultry medicines get for...
